I find in the Constitutional Debates this remark made by one of the most distinguished men who had to do with the preparing of that great instrument, and who had perhaps more than any other man to do with inducing the people to accept and adopt the Constitution after it had been framed and sent out for ratification by the various States then constituting the Confederation. Mr. Hamilton, the great Federalist, who believed in the centralization of power, who believed in a strong and powerful government that could control, legislate, and regulate the affairs of a great people, took this ground in connection with the size of the lower House, the only elastic body that exists under our form of government. He said:

He avowed himself a friend to a rigorous government, but would declare at the same time he held it essential that the popular branch of it should be on a broad foundation. He was seriously of the opinion that the House of Representatives was on so narrow a scale as to be really dangerous and to warrant a jealousy in the people for their liberties.

The clause that he was then discussing provided for 65 Representatives, and was finally fixed at 60. The very Constitution itself, by its provisions and its terms, contemplates a gradual increase in the size of this great representative elastic body in order to keep pace with the development and increasing population of the Republic. It provides for an apportionment every ten years, after a census shall have been taken, and the very instrument contemplates an increase in the size of this House until this limit to which I have called attention is reached—the limit of an unwieldy character, when it is incapable of properly performing its legislative functions. This, you have seen, was the idea of Hamilton when engaged in the discussion of the instrument itself.

One of the great objections to the adoption of the Constitution was the very fact that the House was too small in number; that it was susceptible to improper influences and liable to be improperly controlled, and the liberties of the people were not safe when they were intrusted in the hands of so small a body of men; mark you, 1 for every 30,000. And Alexander Hamilton, in that great series of papers known as "The Federalist," entered the controversy to defend that proposition, and in his defense he gave these reasons for its existence and for the adoption of the Constitution, notwithstanding the small size of the House at the beginning of the Government. He says:

[Federalist, No. 55—Hamilton.]

The charges exhibited against it are: First, that so small a number of Representatives will be an unsafe depository of the public interests; secondly, that they will not possess a proper knowledge of the local circumstances of their numerous constituents; thirdly, that they will be taken from that class of citizens which will sympathize least with the feelings of the mass of the people, and be most likely to aim at a permanent elevation of the few on the depression of the many; fourthly, that defective as the number will be in the first instance, it will be more and more disproportionate by the increase of the people and the obstacles which will prevent a correspondent increase of the representation.

At the expiration of twenty-five years, according to the computed rate of increase, the number of Representatives will amount to 200, and of fifty years to 400. This is a number which I presume will put an end to all fears arising from the smallness of the body. I take for granted here what I shall, in answering the fourth objection, hereafter show that the number of Representatives will be augmented from time to time in the manner provided by the Constitution. On a contrary supposition I should admit the objection to have very great weight indeed.

The true question to be decided is whether the smallness of the number, as a temporary regulation, be dangerous to the public liberty; whether 65 members for a few years and a hundred or two hundred for a few years more be a safe depositary for a limited and well-guarded power of legislating for the United States.

The remaining charge against the House of Representatives which I am to examine is grounded on a supposition that the number of members will not be augmented from time to time, as the progress of population may demand. It has been admitted that this objection, if well supported, should have great weight.

I concede that gentlemen standing here now, in the light of the twentieth century, with the experience of more than a hundred years, are better qualified to judge of the size of this House than was Alexander Hamilton in 1787; but it is significant that Hamilton thought and urged as one of the reasons for the adoption of the Constitution that its minimum when it reached its expected size, when it would securely guarantee the liberties of the American people, would be at least 400 members, 14 more than proposed in accordance with the bill of the minority.

I submit that we are in line with the fathers of the Republic upon this proposition of increases. Let me call the attention of the House for one moment further to some of the considerations which suggested themselves to Hamilton as reasons why the House should not consist of a large and unwieldy number. He says:

One observation, however, I must be permitted to add on this subject as claiming, in my judgment, a very serious attention. It is that in all legislative assemblies the greater the number composing them may be the fewer will be the men who will in fact direct their proceedings.

Has this House reached the size that it can truthfully be said that there are any few men that can direct its proceedings? If it be true of 350 or 340 members, we have abdicated our rights and privileges as representatives of this Republic; if that condition be not true, then its limit is not already reached in accordance with Hamilton's ideas.

Again—

In the first place, the more numerous an assembly may be, of whatever characters composed, the greater is known to be the ascendency of passion over reason.

Now, has this House reached the size, or will the addition of 29 members to it develop a size that will put it in a position where it will be controlled by passion and not by reason? Will the House stultify its own membership on the theory of Hamilton, by coming to the conclusion that the House has got to a size where it is productive of fear for this cause?

Again—

In the next place, the larger the number, the greater will be the proportion of members of limited information and of weak capacities.

Has this House reached the condition in its membership so that it can be properly criticised as composed of members of limited information and weak capacity? If it has, its size ought not to be increased at all, and other men ought to be sent here. If 29 more men are added, will it demonstrate that then it will be a House composed of men of limited information and weak capacities? Is it necessary for me to stop here and say that this House sitting here now, for intelligence and capacity and ability to discharge public business with economy and dispatch, has never been exceeded by any House that ever sat, from the days of Hamilton to the days of William McKinley? I challenge the production of the proof that can demonstrate that this House can not, when it will, intelligently legislate for the American people unless it is loaded up with a tremendously increased constituency. That is absurd. It is occupied by matters other than those connected with the enactment of legislation.

Here he goes on further and says:

On the same principles, the more multitudinous a representative assembly may be rendered the more it will partake of the infirmities incident to collective meetings of the people. Ignorance will be the dupe of cunning, and passion the slave of sophistry and declamation.

Does this House want to say that it must keep the membership at 357, and if we increase it 29 that ignorance will become the dupe of cunning?

Has it reached that in the history of the Republic? These are limitations—reasonable limitations—proper qualifications suggested by one of the greatest men, perhaps the greatest, who participated in the formation of the Constitution and the procuring of its adoption. This is Hamilton, the man with monarchical tendencies. Jefferson, the great Democrat of his time, as is well known, entertained even more liberal views as to the size of the representative body requisite for safety. He appreciated the fact that the smaller the body the more easily it could be corruptly and improperly controlled.

Now, I submit to this House that all its various apportionments, with the exception of the year 1842, have been entirely in line with the suggestion, with the argument, and with the reasons of these distinguished men. The following table shows the apportionments:

	Ratio.	Whole number of Representatives.
Constitution, 1789	30,000	65
First Census, 1793	33,000	105
Second Census, 1803	33,000	141
Third Census, 1813	35,000	181
Fourth Census, 1823	40,000	213
Fifth Census, 1833	47,700	240
Sixth Census, 1843	70,680	223
Seventh Census, 1853	93,423	233
Eighth Census, 1863	127,381	243
Ninth Census, 1873	131,425	293
Tenth Census, 1883	151,911	325
Eleventh Census, 1893	173,901	356

This table shows the increase from time to time, with the percentage of increase:

Increase of House and per cent since 1789.

	Number.	Increase.	Per cent.
First Census, 1793	65 to 105	40	61
Second Census, 1803	105 to 141	36	34

Fourth Census, 1823	181 to 213	32	18
Fifth Census, 1833	213 to 240	27	13
Sixth Census, 1843	240 to 223	*17
Seventh Census, 1853	223 to 233	10	4

Eleventh Census, 1893	325 to 356	31	10

*Decrease.

Average increase, 20 per cent.

The increase proposed by the minority bill is 29, or 9 per cent.

The percentage of increase in the size of the ratio is as follows:

	Per cent.
First Census, 1793	10
Second Census, 1803	0
Third Census, 1813	*15
Fourth Census, 1823	14
Fifth Census, 1833	19
Sixth Census, 1843	48
Seventh Census, 1853	32
Eighth Census, 1863	36
Ninth Census, 1873	3

*Average increase in size of ratio, 19 per cent.

The increase on the basis of 386 is 12 per cent.

The increase on the basis of 357 is 20 per cent.

The percentage of increase of population during the same period was:

Year.	Population.	Per cent.
1810	7,239,881	36
1820	9,633,822	33
1830	12,866,020	33
1850	23,191,876	36
1860	31,443,321	36
1870	38,558,371	23
1880	50,155,783	30
1890	62,622,250	25

Average increase, 31 per cent.

The average increase in this House has been 20 per cent. It has been increased at every apportionment except in 1843, when it was decreased by 17 members on the initiative of the Senate. It may be well for us to bear in mind that the Senate, that great coordinate body, has the same interest in the size of this House, in many respects, as has the House itself; and the Senate on three occasions has controlled the size of this House. In 1811, with 181 Representatives, the apportionment bill was amended by striking out a ratio of 37 and inserting in lieu thereof 35. The House disagreed to it. The Senate insisted, and finally the House receded from its amendment and the bill was passed, and the Senate broadened the representation of the House, bringing the Representatives nearer to their constituents.

In 1842 they initiated the proposition that resulted in a decrease of the size of this House by 17. In 1862 the House passed a bill for reapportionment, making the House the size of ten years before, without making any increase, and in the Senate they made the number 241, giving to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Vermont, Rhode Island, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota one more Representative each, because of the majority fraction, and the House concurred in the amendment. The House started out by depriving these States of representation on the ground of majority fractions, but by amendment on the part of the Senate they were given representation for such majority fraction.

It will be seen that the increase in ratio of representation or the basis of representation has increased gradually, very nearly equal to that of the percentage of the increase in the representation itself. The average increase in representation is 20 per cent. The average increase in the size of the ratio is 19 per cent; but the increase in size of ratio on the basis of the minority bill would be only 12 per cent. The increase on the basis of the majority bill would be 20 per cent; and the increase of population during the whole period has been, on the average, 31 per cent, and during the last decade is 33 per cent. So that this minority bill, Mr. Speaker, is in line not only with the constitutional intendment and the theory of the fathers, but, with one exception, with the universal practice of this House in conjunction with the Senate in determining the basis of representation.

Now, I desire to call attention for a few moments to the objections raised by the majority of the committee to increasing the size of this House. As I remember the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, it was based largely on inconvenience. The report of the committee says it is kept at its present size by reason of economy and dispatch in business. The suggestion is made that the House has grown unwieldy; that it is incapable of properly performing its functions. The distinguished chairman of the committee does not make the statement in that broad language, but he substantially states that it is inconvenient, that we are adding trouble, as a reason why the basis of representation should not be increased, but should be continued at its present size, as a reason why there should be a reversal of the policy of the Republic in this beginning of the twentieth century.

It is a singular fact that this is not the first time that the argument of an unwieldy character, overgrown size, and disorderly body has been addressed to the House. For many a year it has been the fashion to denounce the House of Representatives as one of the most disorderly bodies in the world, and as being incapable of properly transacting business. The suggestion is made that no man is heard, no man can take a part in debate and receive the attention of the members, on account of the size of this great body.

As long ago as 1842—sixty years ago—with a House of 240 members in size, 117 less than the present size, the same conditions were supposed to exist. I quote now briefly from a speech made by Mr. Wise in discussing an apportionment bill, in which he says that—

Never since he had held a seat in this House had it been so inefficient a body as it was at this moment. The deterioration had been constant, as well in the dispatch of business as in the manner and the matter of its debate, owing, as he believed, to its overgrown size.

Mr. Johnson said the Senate had stigmatized the House as a bear garden, and contended, for that reason, that its number must be reduced. Mr. Pickens, in making an answer to some suggestions to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Adams, said that instead of meeting here for consultation and legitimate discussion, if the House was increased in size, it would be a body thrown into confusion, and from its very numbers it would be imbecile for all the purposes laid down in the Constitution.

He further said that—

He knew not what the reasons were which had influenced the other body, but for himself he was influenced by a fear that this House, if a large body, would degenerate into a mob and break down the barriers laid down in the Constitution.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois does not draw anything like so harrowing a picture of the condition of this House as was drawn by these great statesmen sixty years ago. Yet this House still lives; it still exists as a deliberative body; and there never was a time when it could transact its business with greater dispatch than it can this very minute under the rules that now govern it. We here have simply an illustration of the fact that these difficulties and changes are not only largely exaggerated, but to a great degree imaginary.

Let me go a little further and read another quotation.

Mr. Bowne submitted that—

There was no necessity for this House to be told that they were not to be enlarged because they were a disorderly, inefficient body, that they were growing into disrepute with the public, and to lecture them as if they were a set of schoolboys coming here to learn the first rudiments of political science.

These were the reasons urged against increasing the size of the House when it had only 240 members. What would those gentlemen say if they could sit here in this House, with a membership of 357, deliberately acting as representatives of the people and legislating, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

In 1882, twenty years ago, Mr. Herbert stated as a reason why the House should not be increased that "we all know that gentlemen now sit here for a whole Congress and do not know all of their fellow-members even by sight."

Mr. Springer thought that an increase of over 293 would make it necessary to remove the desks and make other arrangements for seating the members.

And members of the House were referred to in 1882, twenty years ago, by a distinguished member of the Senate, as sitting here as "a dumb, uninfluential herd."

Mr. Morrill said in the Senate:

I appeal to the knowledge of Senators who were in the House twenty years ago, when order was maintained there and the Speaker sat in his chair.

It seems that after 1842 there was a period twenty years later when order was maintained here notwithstanding the size of the House had been increased, and notwithstanding terrible forebodings of the statesmen of that generation. But, continues Mr. Morrill (this is twenty years ago)—

Now the Speaker has to stand up all the time and speak in a stentorian voice and constantly be rapping on his desk to maintain order in a little circle round about the Chair; and it is a fact that very few members are able to participate understandingly in the transaction of business.

That is a description of this House twenty years ago, when it had 325 members. And now the chairman of this committee is not able, with his knowledge of this House and its deliberations, to draw anything like so drastic a picture of the conditions which he thinks may afflict us if the membership is increased; and certainly the extreme conditions thus described do not exist to-day with a larger membership.

The gentleman says that men are sent here to legislate. I agree with him. But, I ask, why is it that members of this House have no information in detail about the river and harbor appropriation bill except such items as happen to concern their districts, their special harbor, or their special brook that is to be improved under that great bill? Why is it that none of them understood the provisions or knew the terms of the bill appropriating $145,000,000 that passed this House in eleven minutes during this session?

Why is it that so few members of this House understood fully the details of the bill that passed before the recess giving to two great railroads that enter this capital cash and property ranging in value anywhere from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000? Is it because the House is too large, or because the constituencies are too large? I submit to the candid consideration of members of this House that it is by reason of the size of the constituencies that the members of this House are not able to give the time to independent investigation, so that they may know whether a report that a committee brings into this House is wise or unwise.

How is the time of members of this House occupied? Is it occupied in legislating upon this floor, or is it occupied from early morning in reading over the last mail that reaches every member voicing the wants of his constituents, 99 per cent of whose demands are aside from any legislation upon this floor? [Applause.] Or is it because the members are obliged to read their correspondence and, in the exercise of ordinary courtesy, to answer it, and then to visit Department after Department during the morning hours and during the hours this House is in session? Or is it because members are obliged to look out for needy constituents who desire to be injected into office, and who, once injected, desire to be promoted or to have their salaries increased, and are not willing to rest upon a letter written to a head of a Department asking him to increase the salary or promote the needy applicant, but must insist upon a member making a personal visit to the head of the Department and pressing the claims of his constituent? [Applause.]

It is not the size of the House that prevents members from having an intelligent understanding of the legislation pending before this body; it is the size of the constituencies. Mediums of communication—fast mails, telegraphs, telephones, etc.—do what? They simply concentrate in intensified volume these applications and demands of every intelligent constituency upon the Representatives that sit here. What is the remedy of the gentleman from Illinois to enable this House to more intelligently legislate? Not, he says, that men may make speeches, not that they may take part in debate, but, that they may know what is going on in this House, increase the burden that now prevents this result.

They are already loaded up, every member of them, with a wealth of constituents, with demands that can not be answered and leave them time to investigate these questions. How many men are there on this floor who even read the bills pending before this body, much less investigate them for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not they are wise or unwise?

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEPBURN). Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. Is it not a fact that the House meets every day at 12 o'clock, so as to give us half a day to attend to these clerical matters you are asking about, and then we work day and night to attend to them?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, that is the way I understand it: in order to give the members a chance to go to the Pension Department, to see the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of other Departments, in order to perform the office of a great errand boy, which could be as well performed by a man drawing a salary of twelve or fifteen hundred dollars. When do the members get the time to investigate these questions? Does any man know anything about any question in detail except the particular question pending before his committee?

The gentleman says this business will be performed by committees more hereafter than before. Load up the members of this House with increased constituencies, multiply these demands by the swift mails and by the telegraph and the telephone, so that they can send in their requests and their demands upon members, and the business of the House will still more be performed by committees, because it will be still more impossible for any man who sits on this floor and undertakes to represent his constituency to have an intelligent apprehension of the business pending before this House. Does not every man on this floor know that statement to be absolutely true?

Now, let us provide for that. Let us eliminate that. How? By intensifying the difficulty, increasing the size of the constituency, diminishing the size of the House, loading up the members with this incidental business aside from proper legislation, and you diminish it according to the theory of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, when the fact is that by such a course you inevitably aggravate instead of palliating the evil. The gentleman says that under the rules that now exist—let me get his exact language—rules—

That can not and ought not to exist in a properly regulated body.

Referring now to the rules that govern the House in its deliberations, I do not remember that the gentleman arose in his place when the question of the adoption of these rules was pending and protested against the adoption of the rules that ought not to exist in a properly regulated body.

When it comes to the question of dispatch, every member who sits on the floor knows that under the control of the Speaker and the Committee on Rules there is no limit in this body of 357, and there would be no limit if it was a body of 500, to the dispatch that can be given to business.

The report of the Committee on Rules, sustained by a majority, limiting debate, preventing amendments, goes through this House so long as the majority, whether it be Republican or Democratic, stands together, and any measure under these rules can be passed in unseemly haste, with undue dispatch, and the fact that there are 400 men sitting here has nothing whatever to do with it. The gentleman says these rules ought not to exist to-day. Does he propose to narrow down this House in order that the rules may be repealed, or does he propose to allow the House to go on under existing rules that ought not to exist and legislate as it has legislated?

A little farther on, he says that some committees have been created in order to give places to men who come here, and because it is inconvenient to have a large committee the House must not have its size increased, and members must be loaded up with this outside incidental work to which I have called your attention. The size of the Hall, I submit, is a consideration that has no proper bearing upon this question whatever.

The size of this great House, as the representative of a great and free people, is not to be circumscribed by wooden walls. We do not need to appeal to that proposition here upon this floor, because the cuts that have been put in the possession of the members show that the size of this House can be increased and its seating capacity be increased by fifteen upon either side and probably no man here discover the difference between its seats then and its seats now.

And I submit with all seriousness to the members that if the areas in these corners that are now occupied by seats and lounging room, and used for purposes of consultation while debate is in progress, were entirely filled by seats, so that the whole auditorium upon this floor was occupied by seating capacity and only room enough left to walk upon the end and in the rear, with an aisle to pass back and forth, it would add vastly to the order and the quiet of this House. There is no objection upon the ground of the size of the room, even if that is an objection, that could properly be urged under any circumstances.

I have but a word to say here on the question of expense, although I did ask the gentleman, when he made the statement that it would increase the expense $500,000 to $750,000, to give these details, which he declined to do. I have made a brief computation of the expense for each additional member, reckoning his average mileage at $348, his salary at $5,000, his stationery allowance at $125, and his clerk hire at $1,200, making a total of $6,673.88.

Multiplying that by 29 will give in round numbers $200,000. But why this spasm of economy right now upon $200,000 a year when it is proposed to increase the size of this House? Why this desire to save that sum for the purpose of preventing an increase in size? Why would not some of this economy be wise in connection with some of the other great propositions that have been pending here? This House without due consideration votes vast sums of money, and now it begins to bear down upon the theory of economy because it is going to cost too much to have the American people properly represented upon the floor of this House. That is an argument that the gentleman did not rely upon to any extent, and it is an argument that I submit is entitled to no consideration as against the interests of the people represented.

I have gone over these matters somewhat hurriedly. I have called attention to the various suggestions of the distinguished chairman, except as to the "Cherokee Strip." I do not quite understand how that has any bearing upon the question whether or not this House shall or shall not be increased in size. If the Republican majority increases in size, the size of the "Cherokee Strip" increases. If there was a Democratic majority, the "Cherokee Strip" would be located upon the other side. I do not understand that it is any special mark of reproach, and if it was it would be precisely the same with 200 or 300 members, if you diminish the size of the seating capacity so as to have more room outside, as you have it and use it now. So, I submit, there is no objection that can be urged with force or weight in that direction.

Allow me, by way of comparison, to refer to the size of representative bodies in other countries.

The House of Commons in England consists of 670 members, based upon an average ratio of, say, 53,000, with a population of 40,188,927. That is the great representative body of England. To be sure, 40 members constitute a quorum.

The Chamber of Deputies in France consists of 576 members, but a majority of those are required to constitute a quorum. Their basis of representation is about 66,000, with a population of 38,517,975. And is it to be said that 576 people in France can meet in an intelligent and orderly manner and transact business and that 386 in America can not, because that is the argument—the argument of inconvenience and of an unwieldy character.

The Reichstag of the German Empire consists of 397 members, and it takes a majority for a quorum. It is based on a representation of 131,687. The population is 52,279,901.

In Spain, degenerate, mediæval Spain, 431 members constitute their lower house, their congress, one for every 40,719 of population, and it takes 70 members for a quorum. The population is 17,550,216.

In Italy the Chamber of Deputies is composed of 508 members, on a basis of 1 to every 57,000, in round numbers, and it takes a majority for a quorum. Population, 29,699,785.

In Canada the house of commons is composed of 213 members, or 1 for every 22,647, and it takes 20 members, with the speaker, for a quorum. Its population is 4,823,875.

In Belgium the House consists of 132 members, 1 for every 45,757, and a majority constitutes a quorum. Population, 6,030,043.

In Austria it requires 100 to constitute a quorum, and the size of their lower body is 353. The lower house of Hungary is composed of 453 members, and the basis of her representation is 1 for every 92,000, in round numbers, and 100 members constitute a quorum. The population of Austria-Hungary is 41,827,700.

Sweden has a lower house consisting of 228 members, with a basis of representation of about 40,000. I have not the number required there for a quorum. Population, 4,784,981.

The lower house of Japan consists of 300 members, the basis of representation being 1 to every 128,000, and one-third of the entire number is required to constitute a quorum. Its population is 41,089,940.

These popular branches all exist, except in France, under monarchical forms of government, and yet it has been deemed necessary there, in order properly to protect the rights of constituents, to have in the largest instance a basis of representation not greater than 123,000, while the basis of representation proposed in the minority bill is 194,000. And I submit that the Republic can ill afford, with these illustrations of popular representation under monarchical forms of government before it, to diminish the size of its representation or increase the ratio upon which it is based.

Now, I will proceed with an analysis of this bill upon the chairman's plan. His plan is this: Take the population of a State and divide it by the number of Representatives given to it by the bill, and thus get the number of inhabitants per Representative.

The following table gives the basis of representation on this theory under both bills:

State.	Majority.	Minority.
Alabama	203,188	203,188
Arkansas	218,594	173,080
California	211,929	185,438
Colorado	269,551	179,701
Connecticut	227,088	181,671
Florida	264,371	176,180
Georgia	201,484	201,484
Illinois	209,193	192,862
Indiana	209,705	198,194
Iowa	202,795	202,795
Kansas	210,070	183,811
Kentucky	214,717	195,197

This table obviously does not include States with only one Representative.

Under this bill Colorado has one Representative for every 269,551; Florida, for every 264,371; Washington, 257,786; Maine, for every 231,488. Maine has the highest basis of representation of any State after Colorado, Florida, and Washington. Under this bill the smallest basis of representation is 171,820 for Vermont, and the highest basis 269,551, Colorado, a variation of 97,731. It takes that many more people to make a Congressman in Colorado than in Vermont; 92,451 more in Florida than in Vermont; or 85,966 more in Washington than in Vermont.

Under the minority bill the lowest basis of representation is 171,820, in Vermont, and the largest, 214,278, in Rhode Island, or a variation of 42,458; and the next highest is 206,768, in Oregon, or only about 34,000 variation, and the variation in the committee's bill is more than double that of the minority bill. The distinction between the two bills on this point is that the committee's bill has a discrepancy of 97,000 and the minority only 42,000. Leaving out the States with but two Congressmen, the variation in the committee bill is: Lowest, 191,760, in West Virginia, and the highest, 231,488, in Maine, or a difference of 39,728. Under the minority bill the lowest is 173,080, in Arkansas, and the highest 203,188, in Alabama, or a difference of about 30,000.

How many more men does it take under the committee's bill to send a man from Maine than it does in some of the other States? Let me read a list, so that the committee can see what we are bearing in Maine. If there is any incongruity or disproportion in the minority bill it only relates to four States at least. Maine is singled out as an illustration, but it can only relate to Maine, Nebraska, Kansas, and Virginia; so that only four Representatives would be involved if they have more than they are entitled to, or there are four Representatives out of proportion, those States having four more than they should have in comparison with the balance of the States in the Republic. Assuming a disproportion, it exists only in four instances.

Now, how many more does it take in Maine than in the balance of the country to send a Representative to Congress? Twenty-eight thousand three hundred more than in Alabama, 30,004 more than in Georgia, 28,693 more than in Iowa, 34,115 more than in Louisiana, 33,147 more than in Maryland, 15,693 more than in Massachusetts, 29,740 more than in Michigan, 25,694 more than in New Hampshire, 22,192 more than in New Jersey, 23,966 more than in New York, 22,295 more than in Illinois.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Illinois, is there any reason why, upon his theory—and I am taking his theory for this analysis—is there any reason, in equity, justice, or good faith, why it takes 22,000 more men in Maine to send a man to Congress than it does in Illinois under his bill, 21,065 more than in North Carolina, 23,591 more than in Ohio, 21,418 more than in Pennsylvania, 36,170 more than in South Dakota, 29,427 more than in Tennessee, 28,241 more than in Texas, 59,868 more than in Vermont, 25,468 more than in Virginia, 39,728 more than in West Virginia, 24,750 more than in Wisconsin? Maine has the largest basis of representation of any State, as I have said, after the exclusion of 3. Let me analyze this bill, and see how much these other States have increased their representation improperly under the committee's bill, on the ratio that is given to Maine. I take the bill as it is given by the distinguished chairman of this committee.

If these States were used in this bill as Maine has been used, with her ratio of 231,498, Alabama would have 8 Representatives—giving the benefit of a majority fraction in each instance—instead of 9, as she is allowed; California would have 6 instead of 7, as she is allowed; Georgia would have 10 instead of 11, as she allowed; Illinois would have 21 instead of 23, as she is allowed. And right here, while I am on Illinois, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, to his remarks in the RECORD. He says:

> If Maine is entitled to a member of Congress for 173,617 people, why not make that the ratio? Do you see any objection to that in South Carolina?
> Now, what I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, is, if 173,000 people, in round numbers, is sufficient for a member of Congress from Maine, why is not that number good in New York; why not in Illinois; why not in Minnesota, and South Carolina?

Now, I turn that question on the chairman. If Maine is to have a Representative based on 231,488, why not make that the ratio? How would it do to apply that to Illinois? And if it were applied to Illinois she would lose two Representatives that she is allowed by the terms of the bill under his own analysis. I ask the chairman of this committee to apply his own medicine to his own bill, his own analysis; and right here gentlemen will remember that I put this question to him:

> Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman a question?
> Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.
> Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If 26,955, which is your basis in Colorado, is good for a Representative there, why not elsewhere?

And what does the gentleman do? He is a very polite gentleman; he is very courteous on the floor, and when I propounded to him that question, which he did not dare to answer on the basis of the analysis he was making of the minority bill, he refused to answer and declined to be interrupted. I appreciate the distinguished courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois, but I ask him, the chairman of this committee, to apply the logic that he used as to the minority bill to Maine and Illinois and take out of his bill two Representatives that he reports here in favor of Illinois.

Indiana on the Maine basis would have only 11 representatives instead of 12, as she is allowed. Iowa would have 10 instead of 11, as she is allowed; Kansas would have 6 instead of 7; Kentucky would have 9 instead of 10; Louisiana would have 6 instead of 7; Maryland would have 5 instead of 6; Massachusetts would have 12 instead of 13; Michigan would have 10 instead of 12; Missouri would have 13 instead 15; New Jersey would have 8 instead of 9; New York would have 31 instead of 35, 4 less than she is allowed.

Now, I ask the gentlemen representing the great State of New York if they are prepared, if they have the power and the votes, to insist upon the chairman's bill, when, if the same doctrine was applied to New York that the chairman undertakes to apply to Maine, there would be 4 Representatives that she could not rightfully claim? Now, I call the attention of the Representatives of these great States to this analysis, following the line of the analysis made by the chairman of the committee, and suggest that while it is "excellent to have a giant's strength, it is tyrannous to use it like a giant."

But to continue. North Carolina, instead of having 9, would have 8; Ohio, instead of 21, would have 18; Pennsylvania, instead of 30, would have 27; Tennessee, instead of 10, would have 9; Texas, instead of 15, would have 13; Vermont, instead of 2, would have 1; Virginia, instead of 9, would have 8; West Virginia, instead of 5, would have 4; Wisconsin, instead of 10, would have 9.

In other words, if this analysis which is applied to Maine were applied to every other State in the Union, it would demonstrate that the committee bill gives them 34 more Representatives than they are rightfully entitled to.

Take the chairman's plan, apply it to the minority report, and it may be upon that analysis that four States have a disproportionate representation, four small States that stand here to-day at the mercy of the great States in this Republic. But on the same analysis applied to the majority bill they have 34 Representatives in 24 States to which they are not entitled, eight times as large as the disproportion that exists on the chairman's theory under the minority bill. The outrage, if outrage there be, on this theory is eight times greater under the majority bill than under the minority. This is the proposition, and that is why the chairman of this committee did not dare to be interrupted on this floor and asked to apply to his own bill the same method of analysis that he was applying to the bill of the minority.

Let me go further. Upon this analysis Colorado has a Representative for every 269,551 people. How many Representatives would the State of Illinois have if that same ratio was applied to Illinois? I ask the gentleman in his own language, why not make that the ratio? Do you see any objection to that for Illinois? And Illinois on that basis would simply have 18 Representatives, or 5 less than the chairman of this committee has reported to this House. Compare Washington on the same basis, and Illinois would have only 19 Representatives. Compare Florida in the same manner and Illinois would have only 18.

I submit it ill becomes the distinguished chairman of this committee, in the interest of the bill which is apparently aimed at the small States, on this floor to stand here and charge the State of Maine with robbing States of their representation under the minority bill when the same analysis shows that he has concealed about his own person at least five Representatives robbed from other States. I submit that it is colossal, monumental, insufferable, indescribable, ineffable, infamous nerve for a man to stand here and thus assail the bill of the minority when his own bill on that analysis is so monstrous and so infamous.

Mr. Speaker, I have said all I care to say in connection with this measure at this time. The State of Maine, with these other small States, stands here at the mercy of this House of Representatives. I do not agree with the proposition of the chairman of this committee, that it makes no difference to a State whether its representation is increased pro rata with that of other States.

It makes no difference, perhaps, to the population of the State, but it makes a vast difference to the State as an entity. When you cut down Maine one Representative, you cut her representation down 25 per cent. If you cut down New York one Representative or add one, you subtract or add only one thirty-seventh of the whole representation of the State. It makes a vast difference to a small State whether the State has four men or three to represent it.

I appeal from the malevolence of the chairman of this committee to the sense of candor, good faith, honesty, and fair-minded judgment upon the part of the members of this House on either side of this Chamber. The State of Maine stands here no suppliant at the doors of this House, she simply asks for fair play. She has a record in this House of which she may well be proud. It is a pride in which the whole country may well join her.

There is no line of her record that she desires to erase; there is no page that she has any occasion to turn down. However she may be treated by the House in this apportionment—whether her influence in this body shall be diminished 25 per cent or maintained as it stands to-day—the State of Maine will always stand as she has ever stood, foremost among the champions of liberty and freedom and everything that makes for a higher Christian civilization. I appeal, I say, in the last resort to the sense of candor, fairness, good faith, and justice upon the part of the members of this House. Let no State be crippled in her representation. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, by arrangement with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], it has been agreed that one hour be given now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC], one half of the time to be taken from that controlled by the gentleman from Maine and the other half from that controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, the President, in his message to this House, recommended that we proceed in a constitutional manner to determine the question of apportionment for the next ten years.

The resolution which I have offered is designed to facilitate the efforts of the members of this body in clearing the way of all obstacles, so that we may proceed intelligently in the manner prescribed by the Constitution in the performance of this great duty, with justice to the citizens of every State of the Union and with justice to Congress itself, for it involves the very structure of this body.

There are many questions that can enter into a debate as to the manner in which this House of Representatives of the people of the sovereign States shall be constituted; questions which affect us all; questions which appeal to our own individual interests; but I do not rise to speak concerning these.

I rise to debate a question, which, paradoxical as it may seem, is to my mind undebatable—whether we shall proceed to apportion the representation in this body among the respective States in the manner prescribed by the Constitution.

It would seem that quite a number of the members of this body, probably engaged in the solution of matters of more interest to them, have given to this subject of apportionment but little of their attention, and therefore have, I may say, overlooked what appeals to me as being the vital part of the whole matter.

Indeed, the only motive which prompts me now is based on the belief that if the real point at issue in this great question can be made clear, there should not be a dissenting voice in all this body when the question of obeying the Constitution and its provisions is involved.

I can not believe that there is a single member of this body who would vote in the negative if the question were put, "Shall we obey the plainly written terms of the Constitution?"

Whether the fourteenth amendment or any other section of the Constitution affecting this matter is wise or just, or neither, is not for this House to determine; the question is whether or not we are to obey its plain provisions.

I do not desire to invoke the spirits of the past; to summon the ghosts of thirty odd years ago when these questions were the subjects of debate and discussion in these historic halls, when men whose places in the annals of the nation is fixed for all time indulged in brilliant argument upon these important questions.

All that is past.

The plain fact remains that, after all this discussion, certain provisions in regard to the manner of apportioning representation in this House were placed in the Constitution and are now a part of the first law in the land.

We, the constitutional representatives of the people, find them there.

Are we to obey them or are we to disobey them?

Have we the power, the right, to declare that these plainly stated provisions are unjust, are unwise, and that therefore we are not compelled to obey them?

Have we the power, the right, to declare that these plainly stated provisions are contrary to the spirit of American institutions, and that therefore we are not compelled to obey them?

Have we the power, the right, to declare that these plainly stated provisions are opposed to our political interests, and that therefore we are not compelled to obey them?

There should not be a man in this House to-day who dares take his stand on that position and defend it before the people whom he represents.

There should not be one within the hearing of my voice who dares to declare: "I will not obey the Constitution of the United States," an oath to support and obey which has been taken by every member of this body.

I am not a lawyer, certainly not a constitutional lawyer, a variety which, about election time, seems omnipresent.

I might hesitate in taking the floor and the initiative in insisting that we proceed regularly in accordance with the plain provisions of the law if there was any doubt as to the meaning of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

If there was a fine question of constitutional law involved, I should leave the floor to the learned brethren of the legal fraternity, though I must, as a layman, admit that my long service in this House has not impressed me with the infallibility of judgment of any or all of these great legal lights, for I do not now recall one important subject ever presented here concerning the legal aspects of which more than one member entertained exactly the same opinion.

But, I find that the provisions of the Constitution relating to this question are so plain that there can be no doubting or quibbling as to their meaning.

I find that they are not only plain but mandatory in their phraseology and meaning.

Section 2 of the fourteenth amendment prescribes the constitutional manner in which the apportionment of membership in this House shall be made. It says:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male members of such State, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

No other wording, no other phrasing, could make the proposition more lucid; no other wording could make it more mandatory.

The Constitution declares how this apportionment "shall" be made in unequivocal terms.

It does not say how it "may" be made, but declares how it "shall" be made.

In making the apportionment for the next ten years, shall we reduce the basis of representation in those States wherein the right to vote has been abridged in the proportion which the number of such male members shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age?

The Constitution says we shall.

There is but one course before this House; there is but one manner of procedure—that prescribed by the Constitution.

I will draw no fanciful picture of what may happen if we proceed to apportion the membership in the House of Representatives for ten years in an unconstitutional manner.

It may lay succeeding bodies open to the most widespread attack—a vital attack—an attack upon all or any legislation that it may enact, upon the ground that it was passed by a House constituted in an unconstitutional manner. Such an eventuality may seem farfetched, but there exists a possibility of future contention on this purely incidental question.

We heard a great deal during the last election about the Constitution.

The peerless leader who four years ago led the hordes of Democracy to a political Moscow; the heaven-sent leader who less than two months ago led the fanatical forces of free silver to a political Waterloo, still sits in his St. Helena beside the Platte and croaks in mystical and solemn phrase about the "Constitution following the flag."

I do not know whether it does or not.

I am waiting for the grave and reverend justices of the Supreme Court to tell me.

But I do know that I followed the flag for about three years, and, judging from the experiences of that time, if it is decided that the Constitution is to follow the flag very closely the Constitution is coming in for some pretty hard knocks.

And I remember that in those days the gentlemen who then composed the party of the opposition, too, used the cry that the "Constitution followed the flag," and I remember that the Vallandighams, the Knights of the Golden Circle, and all the "copperheads" of that time fought us in the rear because they said we were not carrying the Constitution with us into battle; that the Constitution was not following the flag, and that our acts were unconstitutional.

As I am not a lawyer I will not decide on that point now, but whether we were proceeding in a perfectly constitutional manner in what we did or not, I do know that when we got home again we sent to this House of Representatives and to the various legislatures men who placed amendments in the Constitution which completed the work we had done.

One of these acts was the fourteenth amendment.

I thought then these representatives acted wisely, and I have not changed my mind.

But it appears that the fourteenth amendment has never been made operative.

Each decade, when the bill for apportionment came up for action, it was discussed—sometimes bitterly—but no action was taken in conformity with it.

Congress still proceeded in making the apportionment on the old plan—on the basis of population.

At first, in 1872, after a heated discussion, it did copy the fourteenth amendment into the bill providing for the apportionment, but it did nothing toward making it operative.

It was simply a reaffirmation, a notice that Congress knew there was such a thing as the fourteenth amendment.

Congresses of those times, I believe, were led to ignore the fourteenth amendment through two causes—

First. A doubting as to what the fourteenth amendment meant in certain cases.

Second. The fact that the abridgment of the electorate in any State by the specific action of that State was very slight, and might not have affected the apportionment allotted to that State.

When in former Congresses, before which the question of apportionment came, it was urged that the right to vote in certain Southern States was being denied by the operations of the Ku-klux Klan—through what the Senator from South Carolina and the Democratic custodian of the Declaration of Independence defends as a system of "fraud and intimidation"—the point was made by the Democratic members that these denials, these abridgments of the electorates, were the acts of individuals and not of States, and that in consequence the fourteenth amendment was not applicable and could not become so until the States acted. Congress seemed to take that view, for nothing was done.

But within the last decade, in the picturesque words of the same statesman I have quoted, the politicians in these States "grew tired" of their bloody work.

They sought to do by process of law what they had theretofore done in defiance of the law.

In four of these States in the past ten years they have placed amendments in their constitutions and have placed laws upon their statute books that disfranchised from 40 to 50 per cent of the voters of their States.

The defense employed in the seventies, that the abridgment of the electorate was the act of individuals and not of the State, no longer holds good.

In four of the Southern States the denial of the right to vote to 40 or 50 per cent of the male members, 21 years of age or over, and citizens of the United States, is no longer the act of individuals but of the States.

The doubts and quibbles of former years can not be said to exist now to obstruct the application of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

The very argument that was presented then to defend, to-day convicts.

To my mind, the first cause which led former Congresses to refrain from action has now entirely disappeared in these four instances.

Coming to the second cause we find that in 1870 there were three States that had abridged their electorates—California, Connecticut, and Massachusetts.

In these three States there was a constitutional provision for an educational qualification, which disfranchised a certain percentage of the electorate—namely, the illiterates.

But, in those States, the percentage of illiteracy is very light, averaging about 6 per cent.

The basis of representation would hardly have been affected in those States had the fourteenth amendment been conformed with.

An examination into the election laws of the various States reveals an astonishing tendency at this time to abridge their electorates.

When the Congress which adopted the existing apportionment discussed the matter ten years ago but three States had abridged their electorate by action of the State, and in these the percentage of disfranchised males was but 6 per cent.

But since that time similar policies have been adopted by other States, and to-day we face the fact that ten of the forty-five States of this Union have abridged their electorates, and that in these the percentage of males 21 years of age and over, disfranchised, averages over 20 per cent.

The constitutions of several other States permit such an abridgment.

Besides, there are other States preparing to adopt these policies and to disfranchise thousands of men who to-day hold the right of franchise.

In view of this remarkable tendency it is inconceivable that Congress can longer permit the fourteenth amendment to remain a dead letter, and to pass a bill making an apportionment based solely upon the population and neglecting the proviso which applies to all States which have abridged their electorate.

We will not review the past by any discussion of the question as to whether the provisions of the fourteenth amendment should have been made effective when the last apportionment was made ten years ago.

We find to-day conditions existing which make its enforcement imperative.

I do not propose to discuss at this time whether the reasons given for these abridgments by the people of the various States are valid or not, though I have pronounced views on the subject and shall no doubt take occasion to express them in this House at some future time.

I do not propose to enter into any long discussion on the rights of man at this time, for such a discussion could only befog the situation and render our duty less clear.

I am simply pointing out the conditions as they exist; I am simply pointing out that the time has come when the tendency of the States to abridge their electorates has grown to such proportions as to demand that this Congress shall proceed in a constitutional manner in making the new apportionment.

I do not say that States have not the right to establish educational qualifications for their electors, but I do maintain that when they have done so they must pay the penalty prescribed in the Constitution, and have their representation abridged proportionately.

I do not say that we shall punish only Louisiana; I do not say that we shall punish only Massachusetts; I do not say that we shall punish only California; but I do say and insist, as the representative of a State in which every male member 21 years of age and over is guaranteed the sacred right of franchise, that there is a constitutional remedy prescribed for their acts, and I do demand that that remedy be applied.

In order that some understanding of the question may be gained I will briefly sketch the character of the electoral qualifications in the States comprising each of our four great geographical subdivisions.

In the eleven States comprising the North Atlantic division—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, and Maryland—are to be found four States which require an educational qualification for suffrage.

These are Connecticut and Massachusetts, which adopted the requirement in the middle of the century, and Maine and Delaware, which have adopted it within the last decade.

An attempt to place an educational provision in the new Rhode Island constitution resulted in its rejection by the people in 1899.

The old property qualifications which existed formerly in several of these States have been swept away, Rhode Island, a dozen years ago, being the last state to wipe them out as a requisite to suffrage.

The demand for a poll tax has also grown in disfavor in this section.

In Pennsylvania, however, a man must have paid a State or county tax within two years to be eligible to vote.

In Massachusetts before a man can register he must prove that he has been assessed to the payment of a poll tax.

In New Hampshire a man who has been excused at his own request from the payment of a tax may not vote unless he first make a tender of the amount of the tax.

In the Central Northern States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Kentucky—are to be found no abridgment of the electorate.

On the contrary, we find extensions not found in the Southern or Atlantic States in regard to Indian citizenship and suffrage.

Michigan and Wisconsin grant a vote to Indians not in the tribal relation. Minnesota admits to the suffrage persons of mixed white and Indian blood who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization, and also pure-blooded Indians, who upon examination before any district court of the State may prove that they have adopted the language, habits, and customs of civilization and shall be pronounced by the court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State.

It may be interesting to note that the number of Indians and half-breeds in Minnesota entitled to vote under this provision is 1,342.

Another peculiarity is the extension of the right of suffrage on State affairs in five of these States—Indiana, Wisconsin, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—to aliens. There are no poll-tax requirements in the States of this division.

Indiana alone of this division disqualifies United States soldiers, sailors, and marines from the right of suffrage.

In the western division of States—California, Oregon, Nevada, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Wyoming, and Utah—we again find a multitude of diverse provisions for an abridgment of the electorate, seemingly dependent upon local conditions.

California and Nevada exclude all natives of China; Idaho, "Chinese or persons of Mongolian descent not born in the United States."

Oregon, "No negro, Chinaman, or mulatto shall have the right of suffrage," the disqualification so far as it refers to negroes and mulattoes being obsolete.

Washington, Idaho, and North Dakota specifically exclude from suffrage Indians who have not renounced the tribal relation.

The constitution of Idaho disqualifies any person "who is a bigamist or polygamist, or is living in what is known as a patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage," or who "in any manner teaches, advises, counsels, or contributes to the support of any order, organization, association, corporation, or society" which gives countenance to them.

Wyoming has a constitutional limitation of the suffrage to those who can read the constitution.

California requires that voters be able to read the constitution and write their names.

In 1896 Washington adopted an amendment disqualifying future applicants for the suffrage who should not be able to speak and read the English language, but the amendment is not in force, as the legislature has passed no law prescribing a method by which this ability may be determined.

The Colorado constitution authorizes the general assembly to prescribe an educational qualification, stipulating, however, that no qualified voter shall be thereby deprived of the right to vote.

North Dakota last year adopted a constitutional amendment providing not only that "the legislature shall by law establish an educational test as a qualification," but also that it "may prescribe penalties for failing, neglecting, or refusing to vote at any general election."

In none of these States is the payment of a poll tax made a prerequisite to voting, although Nevada's constitution authorizes such a requirement.

The precedent established in the New England States of requiring educational qualifications of the elector during the past decade developed rapidly in the Southern mind, seeking eagerly for some method to shake off the so-called negro problem.

It developed in various forms, as will be shown later, but nowhere to the extent of wholesale disfranchisement as in four of the States—Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, and North Carolina.

Even in the South these four States occupy a position of their own in this matter which requires discussion.

Mississippi led the way.

She had refused to accept a suggestion from President Johnson that the ballot be given to negroes who possessed a little property and who could read and write, and was forced to accept a constitution which not only admitted to the suffrage all male citizens of the United States possessing certain age and residence qualifications, but which also prohibited the imposing of any property or educational qualifications before 1885.

Accordingly, a few years after this proscription had expired we find her naturally turning to a new constitution in which the desired changes could be made.

It is consequently no surprise that the constitution adopted in 1890 contains the qualification for an educational test, in the requirement that on and after January 1, 1892, every elector, in addition to the other qualifications, should be "able to read any section of the constitution of this State, or * * * to understand the same when read to him, or give a reasonable interpretation thereof." (Article XII, sec. 244, Constitution of Mississippi.) The payment of a poll tax is also required.

This provision was upheld in the State courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it was held that—

> The provisions * * * in section 244 of the constitution of Mississippi, making the ability to read any section of the constitution, or to understand it when read, as a necessary qualification to a legal voter * * * do not amount to a denial of the equal protection of the law secured by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and it has not been shown that their administration was evil, but only that evil was possible under them.

Encouraged by the decision of the Mississippi courts, for the United States Supreme Court decision was not rendered until April 25, 1898, South Carolina called a constitutional convention for a similar purpose.

Its convention of 1895 adopted substantially the same provisions for immediate effect, but only as a temporary measure.

Up to January 1, 1898, all males of voting age—

> Who can read any section of this constitution submitted to them by the registration officer, or understand and explain it when read to them by the registration officer, shall be entitled to register and become (permanent) electors.

After that period these qualifications were replaced for all new applicants for registration by the following:

> The applicant must be able to read and write any section of the constitution submitted to him by the registration officer, or show that he owns and has paid taxes collectible during the previous year on property within the State assessed at $300 or more.

Inspired by the success of Mississippi and South Carolina in abridging the negro vote by these measures, in 1898 Louisiana called a constitutional convention to deal with the matter.

As South Carolina had exceeded Mississippi by providing a property qualification, so Louisiana outdid both by making a new contribution to this class of legislation. The educational test was made more rigorous by requiring the writing out of an application for registration, involving an elaborate formula of 75 words, while the property option was made the same as fixed by South Carolina.

Then came the new provision, which allowed three months and a half for any man to secure his registration as a voter for life who, while possessing neither the property nor the educational qualifications, could prove that—

> On January 1, 1867, or any date prior thereto, he was entitled to vote under the constitution or statutes of any State of the United States wherein he then resided, or that he was the son or grandson of some such person not less than 21 years of age at the date of the adoption of this constitution.

North Carolina followed in August, 1900, by adopting an amendment to the constitution which requires that the candidate for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the constitution in the English language, unless he registers as one who was a legal voter on or before January 1, 1867, or as "a lineal descendant of any such person."

The payment of a poll tax for the previous year is required, but no property qualification.

"Lineal descendants" are allowed until December 1, 1908, for their registration.

Two other Southern States, Alabama and Virginia, are preparing to call conventions for the purpose of effecting similar abridgments of the electorate. Georgia defeated the proposition, but in the new legislature a bill for the same purpose has been introduced.

In 1890 in Mississippi the colored males of voting age were 150,436 and the white males of voting age 121,504, a total electorate of 271,940.

The workings of the new constitution reduced the registered colored electors to 16,234 and the registered white electors to 109,337, or a total electorate of 125,571.

This is an abridgment of 146,369, or 54 per cent.

There is a vagueness to these statistics, because it is not shown how many voters eligible to register under the new law failed for reasons other than legal to do so.

They show, however, the extent of the abridgment.

In 1897, under the operations of the old law in Louisiana, we find there was a registration of 164,088 white electors and 130,344 colored electors.

Under the new law the registration in 1898 was 74,133 white and 62,402 colored electors.

This is an abridgment of the 294,432 voters of 1897 to 136,535, or of 157,897, or 53 per cent.

Having shown a general abridgment, irrespective of sectional lines, of the electorate in a number of the States, it is of moment to inquire into the manner in which the applications of the penalizing provisions of the fourteenth amendment would affect the representation in Congress.

It is the purpose of my resolution to secure information through official channels that is needed. Estimates can be made from incomplete and scattered data, but these are not sufficient for Congress to act upon.

From such as have been available I estimate the proportion of males over 21 and citizens of the United States who have been disfranchised by the action of the States to be as follows:

California, 7.7; Connecticut, 5.3; Delaware, 14.3; Louisiana, 45.8; Maine, 5.5; Massachusetts, 6.2; Mississippi, 40; North Carolina, 35.7; South Carolina, 45; Wyoming, 3.4.

The Committee on Census has prepared majority and minority reports to this House on this matter.

To my mind neither answers the requirements of the Constitution.

The majority report is one which is absolutely in defiance of the Constitution in that it makes population alone the basis of representation, while it ignores the fact that in 10 States the electorates have been abridged an average of 21 per cent.

The minority report is defective in that, while it is based upon the fourteenth amendment, the information which Congress must have upon the matter before it can proceed has not as yet been gathered.

It is incomplete, and therefore unsatisfactory, but it is far preferable to the other, because it attempts, though in a crude fashion, to comply with the requirements of the Constitution.

The resolution I offered is as follows, viz:

> Whereas the continued enjoyment of full representation in this House by any State which has, for reasons other than participation in rebellion or other crime, denied to any of the male inhabitants thereof, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, Presidential electors, and other specified officers, is in direct violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that in such case "the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State," and is an invasion of the rights and dignity of this House and of its members, and an infringement upon the rights and privileges in this House of other States and their Representatives; and
> Whereas the States of Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, Delaware, California, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Wyoming, Oregon, and other States do, by the provisions of the constitutions and statutes of such States, and for reasons other than participation in rebellion or other crime, deny the right to vote for members of Congress and Presidential electors, as well as the executive and judicial officers of such States and members of the legislatures thereof, to male inhabitants 21 years of age and over and citizens of the United States; and such denial in certain of the said States extends to more than one-half of those who prior to the last apportionment of representation were entitled to vote in such States; and
> Whereas in order that the apportionment of membership of the House of Representatives may be determined in a constitutional manner: Therefore, be it
> Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Director of the Census is hereby directed to furnish this House, at the earliest possible moment, the following information:
> First. The total number of male citizens of the United States over 21 years of age in each of the several States of the Union.

Second. The total number of male citizens of the United States over 21 years of age who, by reason of State constitutional limitations or State legislation, are denied the right of suffrage, whether such denial exists on account of illiteracy, on account of pauperism, on account of polygamy, or on account of property qualifications, or for any other reason.

Resolved further, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a select committee of five members from the membership of the Census Committee of the House of Representatives, who shall investigate the question of the alleged abridgment of the elective franchise for any of the causes mentioned in all the States of the Union in which constitutional or legislative restrictions on the right of suffrage are claimed to exist, and that such committee report its findings within twenty days from the date of the adoption of this resolution to the said Census Committee, and that within one week after the said report shall have been received by the Census Committee the Census Committee shall return a bill to the House of Representatives providing for the apportionment of the membership of the House of Representatives based on the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The purpose of the resolution is to enable Congress to proceed in a fair and just manner to comply with the Constitution.

It is offered with the object that Congress may secure and have before it that information which it must possess in order that it may act not only intelligently but justly.

With this information before us and guided by the Constitution we can do no man and no State an injustice; we will be true to our people, to the State, and to the Constitution.

To those who may declare that if we proceed in a constitutional manner, as the President has recommended, and as is our duty, we will arouse the slumbering fires of sectional hate, it is but necessary to recall the fact that of the States which have abridged their electorate and which should suffer the penalty prescribed in the fourteenth amendment, but four are in the South.

In the midst of a reunited nation, when many of the men who served the South most faithfully in the sixties are now serving beneath the Stars and Stripes; when the sons of men who fought each other years ago are serving side by side in far-off Luzon in support of the nation's sovereignty, there can be no sectionalism.

We want no South, we want no North, we want no East, we want no West.

We want only one country—America!

In a reunited country the demand that the provisions of the Constitution be complied with can not be construed as sectionalism.

The declaration that they shall not be carried out because one geographical section is opposed to them is the acme of sectionalism.

The cry of sectionalism can not come from men who are seeking to enforce provisions which apply to the whole country, to every State which has abridged its electorate, no matter what its geographical location may be, whether East or West, North or South.

Such a cry can not come from men who contend that Massachusetts as well as Louisiana shall be subjected to the provisions of the Constitution, that California must be amenable to the same provisions as the State of Maine.

No, the responsibility for the cry of sectionalism, if it be raised, must come from the other side—from the men who would know only the geographical bounds of a State, who would repeat that what is law in California must not be applied to Maine, that what is law in Massachusetts must not be applied to Louisiana.

They are the sectionalists; not we, who seek to make the Constitution apply to every State in the Union.

Those who would seek to find in this the old race question do not deserve recognition.

The constitutionality of the "grandfather clauses" in the constitutions of the States of North Carolina and Louisiana, which were openly adopted with the expressed view of annulling the fifteenth amendment, must sooner or later be passed upon by the Supreme Court.

That body will decide whether or not they are in conformity with the amendment which declares that no exception shall be made in citizenship because of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The educational qualification is not a racial one where no exception is made in favor of ignorant white citizens over ignorant colored citizens.

But in some of the States the exception is made in favor of ignorant white citizens over ignorant colored citizens.

Massachusetts disqualifies the illiterate black citizen as well as the illiterate white one.

The law of Mississippi disfranchises the ignorant white voter as well as the ignorant black one.

The leaders of the colored race to-day do not oppose an educational test for the citizenship, provided the law is applied universally in the State.

Booker Washington, the ablest living leader of his race, has been quoted as in favor of an educational qualification for both whites and blacks, and is bending every effort to educate his people.

A conference of representative colored men of the country, held in Boston last summer, was not opposed to the educational test for citizenship when it was applied impartially to both whites and blacks.

I do not quote this in support of any argument for an educational test, but solely to show that the colored people of this nation are not opposing an educational test when it is one of that character and one applicable to the illiterate, no matter what may be the color of his skin.

When we find the leaders of the colored race and the leaders of the whites agreed upon the necessity for an educational test there is no ground to cry that we are raising the race question.

When such a cry is raised the responsibility must rest on other shoulders; it must rest on those who would seek to cloak their real purposes behind an appeal to men's passions. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this great question I sincerely hope that all discussion of the matters involved may be free from relation to such themes as racial issues and sectionalism, which would but retard the progress of the investigation I have suggested. Let us keep straight to the great issue involved in this whole question. Let us give to every State in the Union its proportionate representation in this great body guaranteed by the Constitution. To act with justice to our people, to the States, and to the House we must have brought here all the facts of disqualifications in all the States; we must know beyond all question of doubt what restrictions the electorate is subjected to in each and in all the States before we can act with intelligence, wisdom, or justice upon this matter. Let us obey the Constitution.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks,

Mr. GAINES said: Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHATTUC. I do not yield. If the gentleman will wait till I get through, I think he will find that I have covered every point that he desires to make.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ], a member of the Census Committee, is entitled to time now.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, my contribution to this discussion shall be both brief and modest. As a member of the Select Committee on the Census, after such careful investigation as I could give to the subject, I joined in the majority report, and I believe that the adoption of that report is the best solution of the vexed question before this House. I heard with great interest, as we all did, the magnificent speech of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] in his vain attempt to break the force of the irrefutable arguments of the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. HOPKINS]. I listened to him with interest.

I would have been glad indeed, sir, if he could have changed my convictions upon this subject, for I confess that it is somewhat unpleasant to stand here in the position of voting for a reduction of the representation of any State upon this floor. I would be glad, sir, if my convictions of duty allowed me to support the Burleigh bill, or to go even beyond that and support a bill that would rationally, logically, and consistently give to every State in the Union at least its present membership, and to many of them an increase, my own among the number.

I consider that it would be presumptuous in me to undertake to answer in detail the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and I shall not follow him in the maze of figures and in the, as I think, somewhat heated and contradictory arguments in which he indulged; but I shall touch only upon some of the salient points in this controversy and upon some of the arguments that he has submitted.

We plant ourselves, sir, upon distinguished authority and approved precedent for the manner in which we have made this apportionment. I find that so distinguished a Senator of the United States as Mr. Webster, in a report to the Senate on this subject, said:

> The committee, indeed, are of opinion in this case that the simplest and most obvious way of proceeding is also the true and constitutional way. To them it appears that in carrying into effect this part of the Constitution the first thing naturally to be done is to decide on the whole number of which the House is to be composed, as when under the same clause of the Constitution a tax is to be apportioned among the States the amount of the whole tax is in the first place to be settled.
> When the whole number of the proposed House is thus ascertained and fixed, it becomes the entire representative power of all the people in the Union. It is then a very simple matter to ascertain how much of this representative power each State is entitled to by its numbers. If, for example, the House is to contain 240 members, then the number 240 expresses the representative power of all the States, and a plain calculation readily shows how much of this power belongs to each State. This portion, it is true, will not always, nor often, be expressed in whole numbers, but it may always be precisely exhibited by a decimal form of expression. * * * And the exact portion of the State, being thus decimally expressed, will always show to a mathematical certainty what integral number comes nearest to such exact portion. * * * It may be applied at all times, and in all cases, and its result will always be the nearest approach to perfect justice. It is equally simple and impartial.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to say that in the same volume in which the gentleman finds that speech on apportionment, arguing for a representation based on population only, he will find a much better speech made by the same Senator in the constitutional convention of Massachusetts, arguing for an entirely different basis. The speech from which the gentleman is quoting was made in favor of striking off one Representative from the State of New York, and was a lawyer's argument purely.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I thank the gentleman. I content myself with quoting the language in this report as Mr. Webster's view of this subject. The gentleman may use another quotation which suits him better and which I do not happen to have seen. Mr. Webster further says:

As a rule of apportionment, it is little other than a transcript of the words of the Constitution, and its results are mathematically certain. The Constitution, as the committee understand it, says: Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers of people, as near as may be. The rule adopted by the committee says: Out of the whole number of the House that number shall be apportioned to each State which comes nearest to its exact right according to its number of people.

This is the rule adopted by the committee as the basis of the apportionment under the majority report.

It was frankly admitted by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS] that exact mathematical justice can not be done in an apportionment, and, in the language of this report of Mr. Webster, the rule adopted by the committee says that number shall be apportioned to each State which comes nearest to its exact right according to its number of people; and not desiring an increase, we have adopted, therefore, the number 357 and a ratio of 208,868.

I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] in the statement that the real question is whether the House should be enlarged. That, after all, is the real question involved here, and I am glad that so far in this debate we have been able to proceed without anything of partisan bitterness, because this is a question which appeals to us as representatives of the American people, and we ought to be able to consider it carefully, impartially, and without partisan bias. We have South Carolina and Indiana standing together, we have Virginia and Maine, Kentucky and Kansas, with common interests; and in the person of the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS] and the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] we have Illinois and Maine at daggers' points on this question. I am glad it is thus nonpartisan.

I favor the number 357, in the first place, because it is absolutely fair and nonpartisan. There is no advantage to any party in that number. The losses and the gains are equally balanced, and it will leave both the electoral college and the status of this House politically just as they are to-day.

Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, and Virginia each lose 1. Illinois, Louisiana, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, and West Virginia each gain 1, while Texas gains 2. Under political conditions as at present existing the Republican party therefore gains 5 and loses 5, and the Democratic party gains 3 and loses 3—a perfect stand-off.

This, I believe, is not true of any other ratio or of any other number from 350 to 400.

It was adopted, moreover, by a nonpartisan and nonsectional vote in the committee, conforms to past usage, is based on scientific methods, and is sustained by reason, by justice, and by the highest authority. I favor it, further, because I believe that the House is already large enough. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] says that the House is not too large now for the proper dispatch of business, and he contrasts it favorably with other legislative bodies of other countries of the world. He says that we can dispatch business expeditiously when we want to do so. I believe that is true, but I believe that we have about reached the limit when that could be said in truthfulness of this House.

Is the House large enough now? Is the number at present constituting it large enough for the proper dispatch of the business of the country? If it is, why increase it? If, with 357 members, we can properly attend to all the wants of our constituents; if, with 357 members, we can, as the gentleman rather ungraciously says, act as errand boys for our constituents at home; if, with this number, we can properly perform our duties and properly attend to the dispatch of public business and to the wants of our constituents, I ask why should the number be increased?

These things being so, is not the present number the proper number? Instead of asking, Why should the number remain as it is? it seems to me we could more properly ask, Why should the number be increased? I believe, sir, that the comfortable and profitable seating capacity of this Hall has been reached, and while I would not give much importance or weight to the argument that the House ought to be limited by wooden walls or by the size of this building, it is a fact that this is one of the most magnificent legislative chambers in the world. It is a fact that it is almost perfect in its proportions and in its acoustics, and any alteration in it, I should think, would be for the worse. I believe, sir, that the present number is as great as this House can comfortably contain consistently with a proper transaction of the public business.

And then I am in favor of retaining this number of 357 and not increasing it because with the number as at present every Representative here, as an individual representing his people, represents a larger constituency and has greater relative influence on the floor as 1 out of 357 than he would have as 1 out of 386 or more. Then I am in favor of this number because to increase it would increase largely the current cost and expenses of the Government, probably not less than half a million dollars annually. The distinguished chairman of the committee puts that expense at one figure and the gentleman from Maine at a much lower one.

That is a mere matter of calculation, but we do know that the expenses of these legislative bodies in both ends of the Capitol are growing greater and greater each year as time goes on. It seems to me, too, that we have come to a time when a definite policy ought to be adopted in regard to this question of apportionment. We increase 20, 29, or 30 members. Ten years from now, with the population of the country very largely increased, another and greater increase will be necessary, and if we adopt now the policy of increasing the membership of the House in proportion to the increase of the population of the country, it will not be many years, as has been justly said by the chairman of the committee, until we shall have a House of five or six hundred members or more.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] complains that the apportionment fixing the number at 357 is not mathematically just and exact, and he analyzes the bill of the majority of the committee to show that it would work injustice to some of the States. But it is true, Mr. Speaker, that the bill of the majority adopts the historical custom. It adopts the position taken by Mr. Webster. It adopts what has been the custom in the last censuses, and it runs that plan out logically and consistently to its conclusion without reference to its effect upon particular States. It gives to each State which has the full number a Representative, and then to make out the full number of 357 it gives, in the order in which the moiety fractions run, the increased number to the States having the largest majority fractions.

Mr. LANHAM. To all of them?

Mr. KLUTTZ. To the States having the largest fractions, until the number is made up. Unfortunately this leaves out four States, but to include those four States would be to disarrange the whole ratio and to do injustice to a number of the other States. The Burleigh bill does not accomplish that. The Burleigh bill professes to act upon what it calls this same irrational procedure, and yet instead of following it out logically and consistently it makes arbitrary differences in it, in order to increase the membership from some of the States; and this it does at the manifest expense of others.

I regret, as I said, to have to vote, in accordance with my conviction, to reduce the representation of the great State of Virginia, the mother of Presidents, as well as my neighbor on the south, the State of South Carolina, and to reduce the representation of Kentucky, of Indiana, of Ohio, of Maine, and of other States; and yet this to me is a question of conscientious duty, a question of what is better for the public interest, what is better for the whole country, and from that I can not permit myself to be swerved for personal considerations or by consideration for adjoining States.

I trust I may have credit for being entirely impartial in this matter, because my own State of North Carolina, under the Burleigh bill, would be increased to 10 members. Under that bill legitimately run out, as shown by the analysis of the chairman, she would be entitled to 11 and have a fraction over, whereas under the bill of the majority of the committee her representation remains as at present, at the number 9. I am certainly not moved by ill will to any State, nor by antipathy to any Representative affected, for all of them are my friends and a number of them my personal and political associates.

So I feel I can look at this question calmly, dispassionately, and without bias, because my State is not affected by it. The gentleman from Maine complained that this majority bill does injustice to some States—that it did injustice, perhaps, to Maine; and while he spoke for about two hours, I believe, he did not combat the figures of the chairman of the committee that under the Burleigh bill that State would have 4 members of Congress for 694,456, making a ratio of population of 173,617, and if that ratio were extended to the other States of the Union there would be a very large increase in a great number of States. I shall not undertake to reproduce these figures. Certainly it was far from the intention of the committee to do any injustice to the great State of Maine.

Mr. RIXEY. May I interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KLUTTZ. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to ask a question in regard to the phraseology of the bill, which I desired to ask the chairman yesterday, when he declined to yield. The bill, in section 3, provides that the district "shall be composed of contiguous and compact territory." The words "and compact" seem to be added in this apportionment bill for the first time in the history of apportionment. Up to the Tenth Census there was no provision that the territory shall be contiguous. In the Tenth and the Eleventh it was provided that it should be contiguous; now it provides that the territory shall be "contiguous and compact." Now, what I want to know is, who is to be the judge as to when districts are sufficiently compact?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I admit the force of the gentleman's question, and that it has never been in an apportionment bill before, so far as I know.

Mr. RIXEY. But what I ask is, Who is to be the judge as to when a district is sufficiently compact?

Mr. KLUTTZ. The language has heretofore been "contiguous." When the committee discussed it, I will say that word "compact" was added at the suggestion of one of the members, the object of it being to prevent shoe-string districts; but it will raise hereafter the question which the gentleman now suggests, as to what is to be the determining authority of the meaning of that word "compact," and as to whether certain territory is or not compact.

Mr. RIXEY. Is it not a fact that this House will have to judge as to whether a district is sufficiently compact?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I have no doubt in the ultimate the House would assume that power, though I am not ready to concede its right to do so.

Mr. RIXEY. Will it not be a fruitful source of contest here?

Mr. KLUTTZ. Possibly so, sir; I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. RIXEY. Do you believe it wise that we should place in this bill a provision that will give rise to contests?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I shall not insist upon that word remaining in the bill.

Mr. RYAN of New York. I will state to the gentleman from Virginia that that word was put in in order to give the Democrats of the North a fair opportunity to be returned. The legislatures in the Northern States are all Republican, and if they were permitted to shoestring the districts, it would be impossible for the few Democrats from the Northern States you have to get here. It was put in by the Democrats on the committee, with the consent of the chairman of the committee, to show that he intended to be fair with the Northern Democrats.

Mr. RIXEY. I will say, in reply to my friend, that while it may save the Democrats of the North, the effect of it will be prejudicial to the Democrats of the South.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I must decline to yield further; but in doing so I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Virginia in regard to that part of the bill. I may add, however, that these words are also in the Burleigh bill, as I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it will not interrupt you, will you allow me to give you a curious contribution in that line? Mr. Bland's district, now represented by Judge SHACKLEFORD, had one county north of the Missouri River and a whole lot on the south. One time he beat a fellow named James T. Moore, and Moore got up a contest on the ground that that district was not made up of contiguous territory, because the Missouri River cut off a big Democratic county that made the district Democratic. So that you could get up a contest almost on everything. Of course nobody paid any attention to it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is not that true of the gentleman's own district?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I believe I will insist on the floor for a few moments, if I can have it.

I am not disposed to detain the House longer upon this question, now that the two exhaustive and able arguments that have been made, one by the chairman of the committee and the other by the gentleman from Maine, are already before the House. This is a matter which, as I said before, I believe this House will consider from the standpoint of what is best for the public interest and for all the people of the country.

I regret that any State is to be deprived of representation, and yet it is but the inexorable logic of the situation that those States which have not increased in population as rapidly as others, and especially some of those States which under the last apportionment got additional members only on account of the major fraction, must necessarily lose, in order that justice may be done to the States which have increased their population during the last ten years in a greater ratio. It is doing no injustice to the former to refuse to unduly benefit them at the expense of the latter. To do otherwise would be flagrantly unconstitutional.

I believe that 357 members can transact the public business with better advantage and with greater dispatch than the number proposed in the Burleigh bill, or any greater number. I believe that number is sufficient for all the purposes of legislation. I believe they can be more comfortably and beneficially seated in this great Hall, and I believe the consideration of expense is one that ought to enter into the calculation.

When all these things are considered, and the further fact that absolutely no injustice is done to any State except that which falls from the most approved method of calculation and which is inevitable in doing justice, as near as may be, to all, I believe that the members of this House will lay aside partisan differences, that they will lay aside local and selfish consideration, and join us in supporting the bill proposed by the majority. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), I return herewith the bill (H. R. 2955) entitled "An act providing for the resurvey of township No. 8 of range No. 30 west of the sixth principal meridian, in Frontier County, State of Nebraska."

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 5, 1901.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution in connection with the message which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the message and House bill 2955 be recommitted to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, with instructions that it be reenrolled as a bill of the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

REAPPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX].

[Mr. FOX addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL FOLDERS.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ eight additional folders in the folding room, at a compensation at the rate of $75 each per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, provided that all such employees shall be dropped from the rolls of the Doorkeeper at a period not later than one month from the expiration of the present session of Congress.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 3, after the word "room," insert "from December 3, 1900."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman if this resolution has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Accounts? I do not see any member of the minority of that committee present.

Mr. BULL. I will state to the gentleman that it is unanimously reported.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, there were on a division (demanded by Mr. BULL)—ayes 44, noes 2.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

REAPPORTIONMENT.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to support the Burleigh bill without going into detail or giving any specific reason for it, believing it to be the most meritorious bill presented to this House. But yesterday the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Census, Mr. Hopkins, referred to the State of Nebraska in such a way that I feel it my duty to the State to reply to and correct the misstatements made by him. He said:

Mr. HOPKINS. The trouble is not with the bill reported by the committee, but with the condition existing in the State of Kansas itself. Kansas has been cursed for ten long years with Populism. Capital has been driven from the State. Energetic, progressive, splendid men who sought homes there have been driven out and gone elsewhere. That young giant, as it was ten years ago, has been a laggard in the race of the States that form the Republic.

Again, referring to my own State, he said:

How is it in the State of Nebraska? Nebraska, lying alongside of Kansas, is suffering, not from this bill of the committee, but from Bryanism and Populism in that State. [Laughter.] The same conditions that have stagnated the energy and the enterprise of Kansas are operating in the same way in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to a few facts here that will disprove entirely the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that the State of Nebraska is losing either in population or in wealth. In that splendid young State west of the Missouri River, in 1890, according to the returns, we had 11,449,369 acres of improved land, with an assessed valuation of $45,495,813. In 1900 the acreage of improved land was 17,443,819, with an assessed value of $60,459,478, a gain in ten years of 5,994,450 acres of improved land and a gain in the assessed value of $14,953,655. Yet the gentleman would have this House understand that Bryanism is destroying the splendid State of Nebraska.

Coming to live stock, if you please, in 1890 the number of horses was 581,055; in 1900 it was 636,995, showing an increase of 55,920. In 1890 the number of cattle was 1,677,343, while in 1900 it was 2,169,409, an increase of 491,066. In 1890 the number of sheep was 178,586, and in 1900 it was 371,375, an increase in the number of sheep of 192,689, or more than double. All along the principal lines the State of Nebraska has gained in material wealth.

Now I want to come to the question of population. According to the census returns we had in 1890 a population of 1,058,910, and in 1900, according to the census returns, we had a population of 1,068,539, a net increase of only 9,629. Let me call your attention to the vote during the last ten years in the State of Nebraska. We claim that we have at least 200,000 more people in the year 1900 than we had ten years ago. At the first Presidential election following the census of 1890 we polled 200,206. At the next Presidential election, in 1896, we polled 223,245 votes, an increase in the number of votes in four years of 23,039.

In 1900 we polled 241,430 votes, an increase in four years of 18,185 over the preceding election. In eight years we have gained 41,224 votes. And yet, according to the census of 1900, the entire gain in population is but 9,000, while in eight years we have gained 41,000 votes cast at the polls. Out in the State of Nebraska we are not satisfied with the census of 1900, and I submit to the candid judgment of fair-minded men that when we have an increase of at least 40,000 votes in ten years we are justified in assuming that there has been a much larger increase in the population.

The gentleman refers to the State of Nebraska and asserts that Bryanism has injured that State. If I had a son attending college who in debate would use that as an argument, I would call that son home and immediately enter him in the kindergarten class. [Laughter.] If I were to indulge in the same sort of an argument I might call the gentleman's attention to the State of Illinois. I understand that under his bill it gains at least one Representative, but I am informed that the country districts of Illinois lose one in this apportionment and that the gain goes to the city of Chicago.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the gentleman that that is an entire mistake. The country districts have all kept pace with the population of other sections. The additional member will go to the city of Chicago.

Mr. LACEY. Is not that because the city of Chicago has taken in so much more of the country?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; the city limits are the same.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I might argue that it is simply an illustration of the fact that the kind of representation given to the country by the gentleman from Illinois is driving population from the country into the city.

Mr. HOPKINS. No; if the gentleman will look at my Congressional district he will find that it has increased 30,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I were to indulge in that kind of argument—and I thank God very little of it has been used on this floor—I might say that according to the gentleman's bill the State of Ohio has lost a member. Is that due to McKinleyism? That argument would be just as pertinent as that Bryanism has lost Nebraska a Representative. [Laughter.] Is it not so? Let me tell you here and now that we in Nebraska are proud of our citizenship; we are proud of our population; we are proud of our representation in both branches of Congress; we honor the two Republican members from our State and we respect them as well as the others we have here. We have no quarrels among ourselves, but we are asking justice to our State, and we believe it will be granted.

I ask now the indulgence of this side of the Chamber. The gentleman from Illinois passed by the State of Ohio and attempted to strike a blow at what he calls "Bryanism." In the State of Nebraska lives that great leader of the Democracy, the man who fought the great battle of 1896, the man who made the wonderful fight of 1900, the great statesman who is destined yet to lead or perhaps to influence the greatest party this nation has ever known. That man is an honored citizen of our State, and we are proud to say that Bryanism has helped the great State of Nebraska and has built it up as it has been built up, and will continue to help it in the years to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the observations of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX] lead me to make a few remarks in addition to what I said yesterday and the day before with reference to the resolution which I introduced into this House on Thursday. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

As the constitutional mandate is plain, I introduced a resolution authorizing and directing the committee having this apportionment in charge to inquire and report, so that we might have official information, showing in what States, if any, representation ought to be reduced. Considering it to be necessary in order to make the resolution "privileged" and thus entitled to immediate consideration, to lay a proper foundation by reciting some facts to justify it, I referred in the preamble to the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina, they affording very vivid illustrations, having recently, by changes in their constitutions, disfranchised about half of the voters who were formerly entitled to vote. The preamble also sets forth that it is a matter of common rumor that other States have by constitutional or statutory enactment disfranchised some portion of their male citizens 21 years old.

We already have abundant data as to Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina, but North Carolina has more recently changed her constitution and the change has not yet gone into effect, so that the figures are not readily available. Moreover, Massachusetts, Connecticut, California, and, I believe, Oregon, and some other States have educational and property conditions disfranchising some of their 21-year-old inhabitants. My resolution is broad, and extends to every State in the Union. I was therefore surprised to find in large headlines in a prominent newspaper this morning a declaration that "Mr. OLMSTED aims to injure the South." I fail to see how a demand for official information to enable us to fairly, justly, and constitutionally apportion Representatives among the States can be held as indicating an intention or desire to injure any particular section. I deny the proposition and distinctly disclaim any personal feeling toward the South or any section of the country.

Why, Mr. Speaker, no gentleman from the South who has addressed the House upon this subject or upon the subject of my resolution has more or better or more highly prized personal friends south of Mason and Dixon's line than myself. My dearest human possession, dearer to me than the ruddy drops that visit my fond heart, is a gift of the South—a Virginian of Virginians—and the blood that flows in the veins of my infant son is to the extent of one-half, at least, of the purest and best Southern strain. But I am unable to see that any love that I may have for the South or any of her people, any more than my love and respect for the people of my own State of Pennsylvania, demands that I shall ignore the Constitution of the United States, which, as a member of Congress, I am sworn to support and defend, or that I shall cheerfully agree that the State of Mississippi shall have twice as many members upon this floor as she is entitled to under the Constitution, or that a certain number of white voters in Mississippi or in Louisiana or in either one of the Carolinas shall, in violation of the Constitution, be permitted to elect two or three times as many members in Congress as the same number of white voters in other States are permitted to elect.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said yesterday that if we are in favor of the upbuilding of the negro race and of honest government in the Southern States, "when we have done that, when we have worked out the problem and put it upon a fair basis, then if we are getting more representation than we are entitled to, five or six or ten years from now," he would agree to a constitutional amendment that would put representation upon a fair basis. And the gentleman from Mississippi said that we ought to be glad to see intelligence in control of the destiny of that State. Now, the trouble with me, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FOX. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. FOX. What I was speaking about was the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. OLMSTED. I refer to the gentleman from Mississippi who spoke yesterday [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The difficulty with me, Mr. Speaker, is that while I have a great love and respect for the Southern people, I do not feel that I ought to carry it to the extent of agreeing to allow one State for six or eight or ten years to have more Congressmen than the Constitution allows and more than is fair as between it and other States. I do not feel that while Mississippi is working out its own destiny in its own way and by its own intelligence, as the gentleman says, there is any reason why the intelligent people of that State shall have an advantage in representation upon this floor over the intelligent people of other States, who are also working out their own destiny. Now, let us see how this works. The gentleman from Misiissippi who has just spoken admits that in his State, which has a population of over a million and a half, there are only 100,000 registered voters.

Mr. FOX. One hundred and sixty thousand.

Mr. OLMSTED. And in his district of 15 counties, with 200,000 population, but 10,000 votes.

Mr. FOX. Twenty-four thousand registered voters. Ten thousand votes cast in a general election.

Mr. OLMSTED. Ten thousand votes cast; but according to the Congressional Directory, he himself received only 3,431 votes, while his Populistic opponent received 1,020, making a total of 4,451 votes.

My resolution makes no reference whatever to the color of the voters or the person disfranchised, but gentlemen from Mississippi practically admit, however, that the negro population is in the main disfranchised by the present constitution of that State. While they were slaves they were, under the Federal Constitution as it then existed, counted only as three-fifths—that is, each colored person was counted as three-fifths of a person in making up the enumeration upon which to base Congressional apportionment; but when they were freed and the right of voting was given them they were counted wholly, each colored person counting as much as a white person in determining how many Congressmen the State shall have. Now, then, if the colored people are disfranchised by the very operation of the constitution of the State of Mississippi, that State gains an advantage because, while colored people are not permitted to vote, they are counted not as three-fifths, but at the entire number, so that upon my friend's theory Mississippi gets an increased representation in Congress upon the theory that her colored population is not disfranchised, while, as a matter of fact, it is disfranchised. The trouble with me is that I am unwilling, and the Constitution clearly forbids, that the comparatively few white people who are permitted to vote, or do vote, in Mississippi are, by reason of the disfranchisement of the colored population, given three or four times the advantage, or three or four times the representation in Congress, that an equal number of equally intelligent people in Pennsylvania are given.

The four States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and the two Carolinas—while in my resolution I referred to three of these, it was not out of antagonism to them, as I have already explained, but because as to them I had the information in my possession, and they afford vivid illustrations of the importance of obeying the constitutional mandate. But the resolution is broad and covers all the States for the purpose of finding out in what proportion the right of suffrage has been denied for any cause whatever and to any class, so that the constitutional provision may be made applicable to any and all of the States which the gentleman has named. Of course the rule should be applied to one if it is applied to another.

The four States in which these new constitutions have been adopted restricting the right of suffrage—that is, the two Carolinas, Mississippi, and Louisiana—have, all together, a population of 6,167,021. The State of Pennsylvania has 6,322,115, or 135,094 more population than all four of those States together. The present Congress was elected in 1898. I take that because I can learn from the Congressional Directory the facts in the several States and in the several Congressional districts, and I find that in the four States named the total vote for all Congressional candidates was about 417,000.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Has the gentleman the vote of North Carolina separately?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I will be glad if you will give it.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have it all except as to one district, where the vote was not given in the directory, there having been a contest, and I suppose the vote could not be given accurately; but estimating that district at 40,000, which is a little more than the others ran, the entire vote in that State in 1898 was 322,280, or an average of about 35,000 to each of the 9 Congressional districts, whereas in South Carolina, just over the line, where its new constitution was in operation, the vote averaged only about 4,000 in each Congressional district, clearly showing restriction of the right of suffrage.

Now, these four States, as I was saying, have a population of 135,000 less than Pennsylvania, and although the restrictive constitution of North Carolina was not yet in operation, the total Congressional vote in the four States for candidates of all parties did not exceed 417,000, while my distinguished and venerable colleague who occupies the seat next to mine [Mr. GROW] received in that year 532,898 votes, he having been elected as a candidate at large. The Democratic opponent who ran against him received 350,213, and enough votes were cast in addition to make the total Congressional vote in Pennsylvania 947,483.

These four States have now 29 members upon this floor and Pennsylvania has 30. The Burleigh bill gives the four States 3 additional members, making 32, and Pennsylvania only 2 additional members, making likewise 32, so that the 400,000 voters in the two Carolinas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, will elect as many members as twice that many voters in Pennsylvania, which does not seem to me to be fair, and is certainly not within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. FOX. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. FOX. Would the gentleman base the representation of each State upon the vote cast at some general election? Is that the basis he would take?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not wholly.

Mr. FOX. In my Congressional district in 1897 there were only something over 3,000 votes cast, and in 1899 there were 10,000 votes cast. A great many more vote at some elections than at others.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Constitution contemplates not the number of votes cast, but the number of people who are permitted to vote. I take it that the proportion of authorized voters who actually exercise their right is about the same in one State as in another.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just to prove how unjust an estimate that is I turn to the Congressional Directory and take the Sixth Massachusetts district, and I find the total vote cast was 20,000; and take up the Sixth district of Ohio and find the total vote is 36,000. Now, will the gentleman use that as a basis and propose that one-half as many people are qualified to vote in Massachusetts as in Ohio? In other words, that the number of votes actually cast is an index to the number qualified to be cast is absurd, is it not?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not necessarily; taking one year with another and one State with another and one district with another, about the same percentage of qualified voters exercise the privilege. I know the Constitution does not say that we shall apportion according to the number of people that vote, but according to those who are permitted to qualify and vote. Now, upon the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, something over 100,000 were registered in the last Presidential year. I am told that before the adoption of the new constitution of 1890 in Mississippi were years in which as many as 264,000 votes were cast. That was prior to 1890. There has since then been a great increase of population. It is fair to assume that the change in the constitution cut off at least one-half of those people who would otherwise be entitled to vote.

Now, it is not the intention of the Constitution of the United States that the people of any State who are permitted to vote shall have the force and strength and influence of their votes augmented by taking the disfranchised class into the enumeration which determines the number of members of Congress which may be elected by those who are permitted to vote. In that particular the Burleigh bill and the Hopkins bill are both at fault.

The Hopkins bill, without increasing Pennsylvania's representation at all, gives an additional member of Congress to Louisiana, which already has more than she is entitled to under the Constitution, while the Burleigh bill gives in the four States mentioned a total increase of 3 and only 2 to Pennsylvania, giving those States an additional advantage over Pennsylvania. Now, I distinctly disclaim any sectionalism in this matter. Certainly the people of Louisiana will not accuse me of it, because it was through my efforts that one honored gentleman from that State retains his seat on this floor. His was one of the hottest election contests that ever came before the committee. I wrote the report and succeeded in convincing most of the committee, although not all, that he was entitled to his seat. I believed he had been fairly elected, and he occupies his seat here to-day. I have never made any distinction in an election case between a Democrat and a Republican, or a Northern man and a Southern man.

But I view this matter from the standpoint of the Constitution, and from the standpoint of what I conceive to be due to the representation and intelligence of my own State and other States, which I regard as of just as much importance as the intelligence of the State of Mississippi and the three other States named. I do not deny the intelligence of the gentlemen who represent those States upon this floor. I admire the intelligence, statesmanship, and the geniality of the gentlemen they send here to Congress, but I do not feel that one-half of the number of intelligent men in those States are entitled to send as many Representatives here as may be sent by twice the number of intelligent people of other States.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. If I have the time.

Mr. GAINES. I notice that the gentleman in his resolution did not refer to his own State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. My resolution applies to every State in the Union.

Mr. GAINES. Will not the gentleman admit that his State is one of the rottenest election places in the United States?

Mr. OLMSTED. No, I will not, because it is not the fact.

Mr. GAINES. And that the Philadelphia American, a Republican paper, has repeatedly so stated, and has it not been judicially so determined? Has not the Philadelphia American so repeatedly stated in its editorial columns?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I do not admit anything of the kind; and even if the suggestion of the gentleman were true, it would have no bearing on this question. This is not a question of purity of elections, but of representation upon this floor—how many members each State is entitled to have. Mr. Speaker, my resolution is intended simply to obtain information which may afford a basis upon which we could act fairly, not only as to the particular States named in the preamble, but other States, my own included.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman omitted Philadelphia and his own State. He did not mention their names or say that there was anything wrong there, which everybody knows is a fact.

Mr. OLMSTED. It is not to be expected that in a population of over six millions there will at all times and in all parts of the State be absolute purity in the conduct of elections, but the difference between Pennsylvania and some other States is that when fraud is attempted in Pennsylvania it is almost sure to be discovered, and, if discovered, is certain to be punished.

The resolution which I offered day before yesterday read as follows:

Whereas the continued enjoyment of full representation in this House by any State which has, for reasons other than participation in rebellion or other crime, denied to any of the male inhabitants thereof being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, Presidential electors, and other specified officers, is in direct violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that in such case the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which such male citizens bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State, and is an invasion of the rights and dignity of this House and of its members, and an infringement upon the rights and privileges in this House of other States and their Representatives; and

Whereas since the last apportionment the States of Mississippi, South Carolina, and Louisiana have, by changes in their constitutions and statutes of said States, and for reasons other than participation in rebellion and other crime, denied the right of suffrage to male inhabitants 21 years of age, citizens of the United States, and such denial in each of said States extends to more than one-half of those who prior thereto were entitled to vote, as appears from the following statistics published in the Congressional Directories of the Fifty-second and Fifty-sixth Congresses, viz: In the 7 districts of Mississippi the total vote cast for all Congressional candidates in 1890 was 62,652; in 1898, 27,045. In the 7 districts of South Carolina the total vote in 1890 was 73,522, and 28,851 in 1898. In the 6 districts of Louisiana, 74,542 in 1890, and 33,161 in 1898. One member of the present House, representing 10 counties in Mississippi with a population in 1890 of 184,297, received only 2,068 votes. One member of the present House, representing 6 counties in South Carolina with a population in 1890 of 158,851, received only 1,765 votes, and 1 member representing 13 counties in Louisiana with a population of 208,802, received only 2,494 votes; and

Whereas it is a matter of common rumor that other States have, for reasons other than those specified in the Constitution of the United States, denied to some of their male inhabitants, 21 years old and citizens of the United States, the right to vote for members of Congress and Presidential electors, as well as executive and judicial officers of said States, and members of the legislatures thereof, and no reduction has been made in the representation of any State in this House because of such denial; and

Whereas the President of the United States has, by message, recommended "that the Congress at its present session apportion the representation among the several States as provided by the Constitution:" Therefore,

Resolved, SECTION 1. That the Committee on Census shall be, and is, authorized and directed, either by full committee or such subcommittee or subcommittees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, to inquire, examine, and report in what States the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislatures thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such States, 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crimes, and the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in each such State.

In order to make the resolution "privileged," so as to obtain the immediate consideration of the House, it was necessary to set forth specific instances in which there was such denial, and I therefore mentioned Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina as affording the most striking instances. My resolution was general, however, and required the investigation to extend to all the States of the Union.

Massachusetts, Connecticut, Wyoming, California, North Carolina, and other States are known to have constitutional provisions denying the right of suffrage to some of their inhabitants, in most cases to those who can not read and write. The Constitution applies to them as well as to the three States first named, but the proportionate number disfranchised is not nearly so great in the other States as in Mississippi, Louisiana, and the two Carolinas.

The fifteenth amendment, which was adopted some time after the fourteenth, provided that the right to vote "shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." I doubt if the fourteenth amendment can be construed as inflicting a penalty for the violation of the fifteenth. Any action on the part of a State violative of the fifteenth amendment would of course be declared a nullity by the Supreme Court of the United States. Nor is it, in my judgment, competent for Congress, in the passage of an apportionment bill, to reduce the representation of any State on account of irregularity or fraud in the conduct of elections. Frauds, suppression of votes, or other irregularities might exist in one State or in one district in one year and not in the next. They are supposed to be reached and remedied in other ways. If they are alleged to have occurred in the election of Congressmen, each particular case may, upon proper contest proceedings, be brought up for the consideration of the House, and justice done according to the facts proved. My resolution does not call for an investigation of election methods in any part of the Union.

I understand that the late President Garfield, when a member of Congress, was one of a committee which investigated this subject, and that he made a report in harmony with the views I have expressed, holding that it was impracticable, if not unconstitutional, to reduce representation in an apportionment bill on account of alleged frauds or illegal acts of individuals amounting to a denial of the right of suffrage. But his report was made before the adoption of the constitutions in the several States just mentioned. My resolution relates to the acts of States themselves through constitutional changes or statutory enactment, and not to the illegal acts of individuals in the conduct of elections, which will have to be reached in some other way.

The right to vote is not a natural right, and, so long as a republican form of government is preserved, any State has, undeniably, the right of restricting it, so long as in so doing it does not violate the fifteenth amendment. If, for instance, any State should enact that the right of suffrage should be limited to males 40 years of age or over, it would be a perfectly constitutional exercise of power; but the representation of such State in Congress would have to be reduced in the proportion which the male inhabitants thereof between the ages of 21 and 40 bear to the entire number of male citizens 21 years old and over, and so I maintain that whenever any State has, by educational or property conditions, partially denied the right of suffrage, to that extent the representation of that State must be reduced, according to the plain mandate of the fourteenth amendment.

Mississippi has, admittedly, by constitutional enactment, practically eliminated the colored vote. It was very skillfully done. Upon the face of the suffrage article disfranchisement does not appear to have been made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is based upon educational and property conditions. It so happens that the conditions adjust themselves to the colored race. Doubtless that was intended by the framers, but I am inclined to think that a State constitution is not to be construed by determining whether a greater number of one race or another will be affected by its provisions, provided they are fairly administered. It is claimed that the United States Supreme Court has so decided in the Williams case.

Assuming, then, that the Mississippi constitution is itself constitutional, it disfranchises more than one-half the voters in that State. How, then, are we going to avoid the command of the Constitution that the basis of representation therein shall be proportionately reduced? No question of negro domination is now involved. The negro has been eliminated. Treating it, if you please, as a matter of fairness between whites only, Pennsylvania has, in round numbers, ten times the white population of Mississippi, equally intelligent and equally patriotic. Why, then, if the white men of Mississippi are to elect 7 Congressmen, shall not the white men of Pennsylvania elect 70, instead of 30, as at present allowed? Or, if Pennsylvania is limited to 30, why shall not Mississippi be limited to 3, or, at the utmost, 4, instead of 7? Does the Constitution intend that a white vote at the mouth of the Mississippi shall have four or five times the weight and influence of a white vote at the mouth of the Ohio?

Suppose the conditions were reversed, and Pennsylvania or New York or Ohio were claiming an unconstitutional or undue representation upon this floor to the extent of half a dozen members. What would my friends from Alabama and Mississippi say to that? Can we not imagine how their eloquent voices would reverberate throughout this Chamber, and how they would demand just such an investigation as they are now opposing?

My resolution raises a question which is, as has been said, "larger than the negro"—the question of constitutional and fair representation in Congress.

The present Congress was elected in 1898. The votes cast for all Congressional candidates in the State of Mississippi aggregated 27,045, and yet they elected 7 members in the present House. In my district in Pennsylvania there were cast 31,843 votes. In other words, it took 4,789 more men in Pennsylvania to elect 1 Congressman than it did in Mississippi to elect 7. There is hardly a populous district in New York or New England in which the vote was not greater than in the whole State of Mississippi; and there are several single districts in Pennsylvania in which the vote exceeded the entire votes of Mississippi and South Carolina, which together elected 14.

In one district of six counties in South Carolina the sitting member was triumphantly elected, although he received only 1,765 votes. I admit that the number of votes cast is not the criterion; but usually it is about in proportion to the number authorized, which is substantially the criterion, because under the Constitution the proportion of the population represented by the proportion of those 21 years old and denied the right of voting is to be deducted in determining the basis of representation.

This is not a matter to be determined by sectional or partisan considerations. Personally I certainly have no animosity toward the people of any Southern State. Neither can I be accused of undue partisanship, as at least three Democratic members from these same Southern States can testify, their contested election cases having been before the Elections Committee of which I am a member.

If, as seems to be the fact, those States which claim to fear the domination of the negro are determined to suppress his vote at all hazards, it is probably better for him and better all around that his disfranchisement shall be accomplished by constitutional and peaceful methods. But the Constitution requires that representation in Congress shall be reduced accordingly. When the negro was enslaved he counted only as three-fifths in the enumeration, but since the Constitution freed and sought to enfranchise him his race has been given full count in determining State representation. The States in which he lives have actually gained in members of Congress by reason of his constitutional freedom and enfranchisement. But they can not disfranchise him and retain their increased membership. They can not eat their cake and ha.e it, too. If they disfranchise him they must accept the necessary reduction in representation.

So far as Mississippi, Louisiana, and the Carolinas are concerned there is little difficulty in arriving at the proper reduction. But they are entitled to have the rule applied to other States as well. If Massachusetts, Connecticut, California, Wyoming, and other States have restricted suffrage to such an extent as to work a reduction in their representation (which may or may not be the case), the rule must be uniformly applied. The purpose of my resolution is to cover the entire field and furnish Congress with reliable data upon which to act. But the Democrats in the House unanimously (though unsuccessfully) opposed its consideration, and even attempted to prevent its being read from the Clerk's desk. How can their action be explained except on the theory that they desire to retain an unconstitutional and unfair partisan advantage?

Fearing that the enforcement of the Constitution will result in the loss of more Democratic than Republican Congressmen, gentlemen who have argued loudly and long that the Constitution follows the flag and is in full force and effect in Porto Rico and the Philippines objected to the securing of sufficient information to enable it to do business at home.

This question is a good deal larger than the negro. It involves the constitutional rights of States to be represented in Congress. Unless something is done the four States named will elect 15 more members of Congress than they are entitled under the Constitution to have. These 15 Congressmen, standing together, may, and doubtless will, often control the actions of this House upon legislation affecting local interests in various States and also upon questions of the greatest national importance. The question is even larger than that. It may affect the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, because under the Constitution representation in the electoral college is based upon representation in Congress.

It is not fair to Pennsylvania or New York or Missouri or to the grand old mother of Presidents, Virginia, that Mississippi, Louisiana, and the two Carolinas shall have 15 members of Congress more than they are entitled to have, nor is it fair that Massachusetts or California or any other State shall have undue representation; and if the result of the investigation demanded by my resolution shows that in any of the said States there has been, for any reason whatever, by constitutional provision or statutory enactment, such conditions imposed as amount to a denial of the elective franchise to an extent sufficient to require a reduction in the basis of representation in Congress, as provided by the Constitution, such reduction ought to be enforced, no matter what State or what political party may be affected.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS].

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. In the brief time allowed me I can not enter into a very detailed discussion of these bills, yet I want to state a few reasons why I am in favor of the Burleigh bill rather than the bill presented by the majority of the committee.

First, perhaps, I should state a selfish reason. "The Hopkins bill," as it is called—that is the bill of the majority of the committee—reduces the representation of my State, Indiana, from 13 to 12. The Burleigh bill continues the present number of Representatives—13. The splendid State of Indiana, with its growth in population and in wealth, shall not be reduced in representation by my vote. In addition, I am in favor of the Burleigh bill because, in my judgment, it follows an old and well-established precedent.

Let me illustrate. By the Ninth Census the population of the United States was 38,558,371; by the Tenth Census, 50,155,783; by the Eleventh, 62,622,250, and by the Twelfth Census, recently taken, 74,565,906. It will be observed that there has been a uniform increase of about 12,000,000 each decade. Let us follow this matter a little farther. Under the Ninth Census there were 293 Representatives on this floor; under the Tenth, 325; under the Eleventh, 356, and, as proposed by the Burleigh bill, the number will be 386. Following these figures, we observe a uniform increase in the membership from decade to decade. The increase from 293 to 325 was 32; the next increase was 31; the next 30, and the Burleigh bill provides for an increase of 29, thus falling a little below the precedent.

Let us go a little farther and see how this precedent holds. Under the Ninth Census the ratio was 131,425; under the Tenth, 151,911; under the Eleventh, 173,901, and under the Burleigh bill the proposed ratio is 194,082. Here again we have a uniform increase, the increase being about 20,000 each time. The Burleigh bill recognizes these natural increases in population, in number of Representatives and ratio of representation, and follows the precedent of legislation on this subject.

The Burleigh bill recognizes the growth and development of the country. It recognizes also, not in the same proportion but in a regular proportion, the propriety of increased representation as established by precedent and the declared purpose of the fathers, and I see no reason to depart from it.

Gentlemen will remember the Constitution provided originally that the ratio of representation should not be less than 30,000. We have gone on from decade to decade increasing the ratio in almost a uniform rate until now the Burleigh bill provides for a ratio of 194,182—six and a half times that provided originally. Then a member represented a constituency of 30,000. The Burleigh bill proposes a ratio such that a member will represent 194,182. You can see where this steady growth has led, and yet the majority of the committee wants to increase the ratio so that a member shall represent 208,868. The majority of the committee, not content that the ratio shall be six and a half times that originally established, propose to make it 208,868, an addition of 14,686 over the uniform increase, for no purpose except to reduce the number of Representatives. That, to my mind, is the most serious objection that can be urged to the majority report.

I am in favor of the Burleigh bill because it proceeds along the line of the action of this House for more than a hundred years.

I am in favor of it for another reason, and, to my mind, a more potent one, a more American one, and one which should be more convincing to the membership of this House than all others—it increases the present number of Representatives. I favor the bill of the minority because it does increase the membership of the House. It was not intended originally that this should be an exclusive body. The Senate was meant to be the exclusive body. This body was meant to be the direct representative of the people.

The intention was that it should be as near to the people as possible—that every section, every trade interest and profession should be represented, not in theory, but in reality. I am in favor of this bill because it provides an increase in the number of Representatives. This is the people's Government—they can not govern if you exclude them from the halls of Congress. The larger the representation the nearer it is to the people. Some people seem to forget this is the people's Government; it seems to be the tendency of the times to withdraw the Government from the people.

Mark my prediction: If the majority bill, retaining the present number of Representatives, 357, shall pass, the next decade will witness an effort to reduce the membership of this body. I am one of those who believe in large representation. I believe in frequent elections. I have no patience with the crusade in favor of the election of the President of the United States once in six or eight years. I believe that the perpetuity of this Republic depends on the plain people and frequent elections, as well as all the people being recognized in the Government.

The tendency of the times seems to be toward the centralization of wealth; of the few controlling the business of the country. The majority report is along the same line—to give a small number the power to make the laws. I would call a halt and give more encouragement to the people who bear the burdens. I would not have less frequent elections. It may disturb business somewhat, but if it does it calls the peoples' attention to the Government. A campaign will always awaken the interest of the people in the Government. The more they know of it and the more they participate in it the more secure the Government. The Burleigh bill gives increased representation, and I hope it will pass, of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFITH. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], who is not now in his seat, requested that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] be accorded the floor for thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, there are three propositions before the House. The proposition of the committee seems to have for its leading idea the prevention of an increase of the membership of this House. The proposition of the minority, presenting itself in the shape of the bill known as the Burleigh bill, seems to embody the idea that there ought to be an increased representation, corresponding to some extent at least to the wonderful increase of population throughout the Republic and its several States.

There is also another proposition submitted, known as the Crumpacker proposition—a proposition which originated, as I take it, largely in the brain of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]—and which has for its purpose the providing of a remedy for an alleged lurking mischief that threatens the integrity of some of the States of the Republic and by reason of an unwarranted, unlawful, unconstitutional restriction of the right of suffrage operates to the prejudice of the other States of the Union and each and every citizen thereof. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to examine this last proposition first, because, in my humble judgment, all the others sink into comparative insignificance.

If there be this lurking mischief to which the very able report of the distinguished gentleman calls attention abiding in any portion of the Republic, even in any one State of the Republic, then indeed there should be a remedy.

The first question I shall examine, then, is, Is this House competent to provide a remedy? In other words, Have we jurisdiction? In my humble judgment there is no question about the power of Congress to strike this lurking mischief and destroy it, if it exists. Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution has this provision:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence.

Section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, as it is called, or Article XIV, contains this language:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of gentlemen to this very solemn provision of the Constitution, and which in my humble judgment places every single member of this House under the most weighty obligation to obey it even to the letter.

This is Article VI:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office or public trust under the United States.

Then, there is another oath that we also take, which is fresh in the minds of every Congressman, because it was written as with a pen of fire in the brain and heart and conscience of every man here when he appeared before the Speaker to begin the duties of the session. He took also this additional oath:

> I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

And so forth. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this lurking mischief exists, if it can be shown to exist, we have no discretion in the matter. We stand not only in this high place, but before the God of the universe, in whose presence these oaths were registered, we stand bound by these oaths with this sacred obligation upon us to apply and administer this Magna Charta of the liberties of the people of these United States. So that the only question arising is, Has there been an abridgment of suffrage in any State? Is it a fact that in any of the States of the Union electors are denied the right to vote?

I propose to confine myself mainly to the performances of our Democratic brethren in the State of North Carolina upon this question, and I honestly believe I can satisfy any unprejudiced mind of the fact that the practical operations of the laws of the State of North Carolina and of the Democratic organization in that State, through the methods they have employed, disfranchised hundreds, yea, thousands, of the white men of North Carolina.

Now to the proof. Having made the charge, it is my duty to give verse and chapter to sustain it. I hold in my hand a statement drawn from the official report of the August election, about which so much was said in almost every State of the Union at the last Presidential election. What does it show? It shows that out of counties containing a white population of 493,216 and 447,000 colored, the Democrats carried that vast black belt, that Africanized portion of North Carolina, by 57,140 majority. Mark you, 51 counties containing a white population of 493,000 and 447,000 colored are made by the operations of a Democratic machine in North Carolina to record a Democratic majority of 57,000 votes, there being about 1 voter to every 5 of the population.

Let me call your attention to another thing. That is the black belt. Here is the white belt. I have here 47 counties containing a population of 555,000, of whom the colored are only 119,000. There is a majority for the Republicans of 3,168. Now, my proposition was that the effect of the laws in that State and of the methods employed by the Democratic machine is to disfranchise hundreds, yea, thousands, of the best white men of the State. How do I prove it? The district that I have the honor to represent is overwhelmingly white. The district that my colleague [Mr. PEARSON] represents is overwhelmingly white. They are the only districts that recorded a majority for the Republican party.

Mr. PEARSON. And nine-tenths of the voters in each are white.

Mr. LINNEY. Why do they record it? Why were they allowed to record it? Because white men will force all the agencies of despotism and treason and take them, as it were, by the throat and say unto them, "By the eternal God, justice shall be done." The result was that in this white belt there was this Republican majority. The conclusion I reach from these returns shows the truth as strong as demonstrative reasoning can make it, as certainly as twice two make four. You can not possibly escape it.

The following counties in North Carolina have a majority of negroes:

County.	White.	Black.	Democratic majority.
Craven	7,054	13,479	1,707
Halifax	9,467	19,440	5,381
Hertford	5,857	7,904	1,010
New Hanover	10,042	13,983	2,965
Pasquotank	5,156	5,591	650
Richmond	10,845	13,194	1,543
Warren	5,824	13,526	451
Washington	4,904	5,296	490
Total	59,149	92,503	14,197

Aggregate Democratic majorities in the black-belt counties, 14,197. In these eight counties the majority of negroes over the white population is 33,454.

The foregoing eight counties are the only counties in North Carolina containing negro majorities, and by the methods employed by our Democratic brethren in a campaign involving the question of the disfranchisement of negroes only the astonishing results of carrying these counties by the vast majority of 14,197 is before us for our consideration. The disfranchisement of the negro in that campaign was emphasized in every conceivable way. The Democratic candidate for governor in a tempest of party rage filed an affidavit in Caldwell superior court "that no white man, in his opinion, would be disfranchised." Only negroes, therefore, were to be disfranchised. Our Democratic brethren come before the country with the laboring oar on them to prove that eight negro counties legally registered a majority of 14,197 votes to disfranchise themselves, and that, too, in the face of the fact that our pious Democratic brethren contend that they have been educating these negroes for the last quarter of a century. The imagination of Pope alone can describe this character of education:

> Nature its model, habit its nurse,
> Wit, spirit, and faculty but make it worse;
> Reason itself but gives it edge and power
> As Heaven's blest beams turn vinegar more sour.

Mr. Speaker, even the worm of the dust exercises the prerogative to squirm when tread upon. But these educated negroes have less resentment than the poor worm, and, according to the election returns, actually voted to disfranchise themselves. Who can believe it? The white Republicans of the west appeal to the sense of justice in all high places of the Republic to protect them against this method of slaughtering them under the false clamor of white supremacy. The conflict, yes, probably the irrepressible conflict, in North Carolina politics, is that of the white man of the west against the domination of the Democracy in the black belt.

But let me call your attention to a few more things about this. How is it that they vote these negroes? Why, there is not one out of a hundred but what wants to vote the Republican ticket. When this constitutional amendment was up I saw an old gray-headed negro walk to the ballot box, one of the few in my county, with a ballot in his hand and cast his ballot. As he walked up to deposit his ballot he kissed it and walked away with the tears in his eyes, knowing that by the operations of a machine as conscienceless as a tiger wounded or hungry he was to be disfranchised. Yet by this instrumentality you see the result to which I have called attention.

But let me specify. Gentlemen say we want proof. Here it is. It is proof beyond question. If 10,000 witnesses were to arise and swear that it is not so, there is not a man who recognizes the existence of a God and his obligation to truth but what would say, "Why, it is proven beyond controversy." Why, Mr. Best, in his excellent work on presumptive evidence, says that the operations of the laws of nature outweigh the testimony of the entire human family. He illustrates it by saying that if A is charged with taking and carrying away a stick of timber belonging to B and it turns out that that stick of timber weighed 10,000 pounds, the mere fact that the stick of timber weighed 10,000 pounds, being beyond the capacity of the defendant charged, rises up in his defense and vindicates him against the charge. Let me show you here a worse case than that. [Laughter.]

The case of that stick of timber is mild in comparison with it. There is a county in the State of North Carolina known as New Hanover. The city of Wilmington is located in that county. Great men live there. Why, gentlemen, the Democrats of North Carolina are the smartest Democrats in the world. In other States the great disparagement between the population and the recorded vote causes simple-minded gentlemen to presume that there is something wrong; but you never catch a North Carolina Democrat in a trap of that sort. He always has a full vote. Take the returns here and every North Carolina Congressman, I believe, according to the returns, got about thirty-four or thirty-five thousand—there were that many votes cast in his district. Let me say that in the county of New Hanover, with a white population of 10,042 and a colored population of 13,000, there were 2,967 recorded Democratic votes and 2 Republican votes.

Now, does not that beat the devil? [Laughter.] Two Republicans! Here is a county that has been voting the Republican ticket, and recording a majority for the Republican ticket, according to my recollection, at almost every general election since the close of the war, running somewhere near a thousand Republican majority. I believe Governor Russell carried it by 1,300. At this last election, before the constitutional amendment went into effect, because that does not go into effect until July, 1902, this machine only recorded for the Republican party 2 Republican votes, when the truth is there were more than a hundred white Republicans in that county to every vote that was recorded for them. How do they get them? It would not do to say they stole them, because my brethren here would get mad.

I do not know any way in the world that they got them if they did not steal them, except by some sort of legerdemain somewhat akin to a story that Captain Todd, of Ashe County, tells. He is one of the wittiest men I ever saw, a man of immense intellect, but a little eccentric. He told me that he had a friend in his county who had invented some lubricating oil; he said he had a favorite dog that he called Truman. One morning he awoke and old Truman was climbing the neighboring mountain, with his voice ringing out clear, strong, and musical, and seeming to him to fill the whole earth. Hearing the voice of the approaching hound, he ran to the path to see him go by. He passed him like a streak of greased lightning. The next time he came around he ran to the path, and as he passed poor old Truman was creeping along and had almost lost his voice, and the fox was 3 miles ahead. So he thought of his lubricating oil, and, said he, "My friend, I caught Truman and rubbed him all over, saturating him all over with the oil, and turned him loose. He climbed the mountain again with greater speed than ever and a full voice. When he came back I went out to see him, and, by the living God, he was 3 miles ahead of the fox. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not say that our brethren down here in North Carolina steal votes. They would get mad if I did. But they have a kind of a machine down there that they have thoroughly greased with this lubricating oil, so that it runs 300 miles south of justice and 200 miles nearer hell than any machine was ever run in these United States. [Laughter.] Yet honorable gentlemen pretend to say that you have no proof that everything is not all right in North Carolina. These figures themselves, upon their face, carry with them the earmarks of fraud.

Why, suppose, Mr. Speaker, the question was as to whether or not fraud had been done in the execution of a deed. Suppose my distinguished friend here was a creditor of mine, and I should make a conveyance to a son of a piece of land worth $1,000 for the sum of $2, and he were to assail that under the statute of fraud, what would be the result? There is not a single member in this House that if sworn as a judge and had the judicial ermine placed on his shoulders but what could judge, from the face of the paper, that it was fraudulent, and the paper would be stamped in the judicial mind under the statute of fraud as fraudulent because of the grossly inadequate consideration; and here is a proposition more grossly inadequate than the question I have put.

Well, now, how do they do it? I admit I do not know. There is one secret that the world has never found out, if I read aright. It has never been known where the grave of Attila, the Scourge of God and the king of the Huns, is. As history tells us, after the night that Attila took unto himself a beautiful wife, Ildico, the next morning he got up dead. [Laughter.] But the Huns adored him. They made for him a golden coffin; they incased that golden coffin in a silver one; they then inclosed that silver casket in an iron one. Their purpose was to give their king, their leader, the richest burial that had ever been given. They placed that casket in the hands of a few captives whom Attila had in his charge. They charged those captives with the delicate task of placing that casket, that rich casket, at a place and in a way so that it could never be known, promising them their ransom, to wit, their liberation, should they execute this direction successfully.

The poor captives bore away the golden casket and came back rejoicing, expecting to be liberated, but their tyrant masters slew them, and the fact as to where the grave of Attila is constitutes the world's secret, never, probably, to be known. The Democrats of North Carolina do not take knives and butcher men, I do not believe, except the red shirts did kill a few down there. They do not do that, but they do that which is infinitely worse. They take, according to the best information I get, and I do not state it postively as a fact, but I state that it is an impression upon my mind, and the only means by which I think they can do it, that it is the only channel through which this great secret will ever be found, the second one, the grave of Attila, the scourge of God, and this grave of liberty, in North Carolina. They take certain negroes, instead of intelligent white men, whom our organization suggests, and place these ignorant negroes at the polls as the representatives of their adversary's cause, some of them blind, actually with no eyes. Many of the rest had as well be as blind as a stump, because they do not know B from bull's foot. [Laughter.]

They take these ignorant agencies and they count out the vast number of negro votes. By some sort of legerdemain they transfer this negro column from the Republican side to their side, and thus in that way they have murdered the conscience and the moral life, not only of the ignorant agencies they have employed, but of the community, themselves included. How else can it be? If that is not the way of it, why have we these astounding, these damning results hanging about the glorious old State of North Carolina?

There is no State more patriotic, there are no people on God's green earth who hate tyranny and would strike down despotism and treason quicker than the great bulk of the people of North Carolina; but with a machine like that, which they have in full operation, even if we had 50,000 more white men in the Republican column than we have got this day, we would be powerless, because figures, you know, in the hands of an ingenious, mad politician, who is willing to adopt any means of acquiring a thing, are more prolific than all the men and women in the world.

Mr. Speaker, this lurking mischief can not continue to exist without great peril to the life of the State in which it occurs and without jeopardizing the peace of the Republic.

There are certain forces in the moral universe that all men, all party organizations, must obey. Dr. Benjamin Franklin, in Poor Richard's Almanack, teaches that "He who spits against the winds of heaven spits in his own face." Every crime, I contend, against the ballot by any son of a State is an assault upon his mother; and Poor Richard further teaches that the American boy, unlike the Hottentot, is not expected to assault his mother as a means of being introduced into good society. If these negroes of the East did not vote to disfranchise themselves, then every negro vote put in the Democratic column against his will, in effect, slaughters a white Republican voter in the West. I therefore plead for the rights of the white men of North Carolina, representing a large white district on this floor.

The following are the counties containing 493,216 whites and 447,309 blacks which, according to this Democratic machine, gave them 57,140 majority:

How is it done? I will tell you one way it is done. The first thing they did was to repeal the law, so that the judicial hand could not be placed upon them. That is startling, I know; but that is what was done. There is a mandamus remedy against election officers. It is about all the remedy you have. Injunction will not lie. I thought it would, and I urged Senator PRITCHARD and others of North Carolina to try and get up an injunction to stop the election under the fraudulent law. I thought I was as good a lawyer as the Senator up to that time, but I found out that I was not. He pointed out a number of decisions to the effect that injunction will not lie against an election officer.

The more I investigated it the more I became satisfied that mandamus was the only remedy. Mandamus had its origin in the court of King's Bench five centuries ago. It was regarded as the flower of the King's Bench. It was regarded as a judicial prerogative. The court had the same power to issue the writ that it has in this country to issue an order of contempt to preserve order in the court. I thought at first, and many lawyers in the State of North Carolina, some Democrats, concurred with me, that a statute repealing mandamus was unconstitutional and void; but upon investigation I found that the writ of mandamus was not a judicial prerogative, but was subject to legislative control by the State.

Now, this grand writ, which is the twin sister of habeas corpus and which is as essential to the enforcement of the rights of the citizen against despotism or other malfeasance of an officer as the writ of habeas corpus is as to personal liberty; that writ which had existed in the State of North Carolina alongside of habeas corpus, without any thought of its having been abolished, in less than two months from the time we held the meeting in the city of Greensboro to determine what remedy we could apply, and concluded that our only remedy was mandamus, was abolished. It leaked out—some man from our meeting—some one told them of it, and they called the legislature together and passed this act; and such an act! [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much longer time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LINNEY. Oh, about half an hour. The gentlemen on the other side have occupied considerable time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from North Carolina be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINNEY. Here is the statute that was passed, and I risk the assertion that there is not a lawyer upon this floor who knows anything about the writ of mandamus—and they all do, because it is the A B C of the law now; then, although it was not five centuries old, because it was just born—I risk the assertion that there is no lawyer upon this floor that ever heard of such an act. Listen to it! Now, we knew that they were going to operate this machine. We met to consult touching the relief, the legal manner, the method, the means by which we should prevent these results to which I have called your attention. They called the legislature together, had what they called a moon-eyed legislature [laughter], adjourned to meet every moon. [Laughter.] They took a recess, which they never had done before in that State. Here are two sections that they passed in just two months before the election——

Mr. PEARSON. It was in June, I think.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes; and the election was in August:

SEC. 88. That upon any application being made or any action or proceeding of any kind commenced or had, before any judge of any court in this State, for a mandamus, or order in the nature of a mandamus, injunction, restraining order, or order in the nature thereof to compel, prevent, prohibit, or restrain the performance of any act in respect to his duties against any officer or officers provided for in this act, the matters stated in the affidavit, petition, or complaint upon which such application is based or action or proceeding had shall be taken and deemed to be denied, and no such judge shall issue any such order, temporary or otherwise, until the facts have been submitted to and found by a jury at a regular term of the superior court of the county in which such officer resides. No such order shall be made or issued upon any case agreed or upon facts found by a jury at a special term.

SEC. 89. That when a jury has found the facts, and any judge shall issue a mandamus or order in the nature of a mandamus, injunction, or restraining order, or other order in the nature thereof, to compel, prevent, restrain, or prohibit the performance of any act in respect to his duties against any officer or officers provided for in this act, such officer or officers shall have the right to appeal from such order to the supreme court, upon giving bond in a sum not to exceed the sum of $100 conditioned to pay to appellee all such costs and damages as may accrue by reason of such appeal. The said bond shall be received and approved by the clerk of the superior court. A deposit of money of the amount of the penal sum named in such bond shall be received by the clerk in lieu of such bond. And upon filing such bond or making such deposit, such order shall be vacated until affirmed by the supreme court, and until so affirmed the election officer shall proceed to perform the duties imposed by this act notwithstanding such order.

Now, I challenge any lawyer on this floor, any Democrat or Republican, or any gentleman upon this floor to point to a single instance where any legislature has ever attempted to lay its hands upon the writ of mandamus. It can not be shown. It would have produced a revolution up in Yankeedom, where the coolest people in the world live. I have examined the authorities of some States, and I find that by this high prerogative writ the fraudulent hand of a bad officer and at other times bad electors has been paralyzed and made harmless by the writ. Here it is repealed. What for? What has that to do with rape committed by negroes on white women? What has mandamus to do with that, pray tell me? What was the purpose of it? They knew as well as they could that the Lord of Hosts lives and presides over the affairs of men; that the effect and purpose of this law was to prevent the courts from interfering with their wicked designs.

The proud white men of North Carolina, the many thousands I have mentioned, would not submit to their proposition which required any citizen in the State to read and write any section of that instrument in the English language, when we have Latin in it, when ex post facto can not be read by any lawyer on the floor without examining it carefully.

You can not render those two prepositions and one verb (or whatever else may be the parts of speech), you can not render their literal meaning in a plenary way, without the insertion of numerous other Latin words. The Supreme Court of the United States required two pages of the printed reports to define ex post facto. Massachusetts, if I have read history aright, struck out of its constitution those Latin words.

But there was that proposition. Our people are rising up against it. They believed in manhood suffrage. The Democrats knew that some extraordinary powers were necessary. They knew that for every evil in North Carolina there was a remedy. Such was the perfection of the law in that State. They commenced casting about and they saw this grand, noble writ lying in the way of the execution of their purposes, and they laid their hands upon it—what for? The results showed what for.

Now, let me return to Halifax. [Laughter.] Halifax county, the big negro county in our State, has a white population of 9,467 and a negro population of 19,440. They gave us 899 votes in that county. And it is said they voted about 600 more votes than were registered. A philosophic, inquiring patriot, during the campaign, when it was alleged that the rights of the citizens were being enlarged instead of diminished—one of the brightest men in the State; a good man, unless his methods destroy him, and they will destroy him if he keeps on—was asked: "How did you carry Halifax?" Listen to the philosophic reply. Recollect the majority was something over 5,000. The inquiry was put by a white man, "How did you do it?" The answer was—an answer which was considered as paralyzing in its effects upon almost everybody in the State who might afterwards have the boldness to repeat the question: "If you were a negro, that question might be essential; but as you are a white man, why do you ask, 'How did we do it?' you should ask, 'Why did we do it?'"

Gentlemen of the House, I was mighty poor once, and am still poor. I had a big hog weighing 700 pounds, and a hungry negro stole a ham. I went for him. As I was out of meat I was bound to get it back. Finding the negro whom I knew to be the culprit, I said to him, "How did you get in there?" He replied, "Mr. LINNEY, you had better ask me why—why I stole the hog. I was hungry; that is why." [Laughter.] The Democratic machine in North Carolina was mighty hungry, and that is why it greased the machine with Todd's lubricating oil in Halifax. If you talk plainly about the matter and say that they stole the election they will get mad and want to drive you from the State; and would drive you from it, I imagine, if they had the power.

Those are some of the disreputable methods resorted to, and yet honorable gentlemen say that a member from a North Carolina district disgraces himself and his State when he exposes this rascality—this lurking mischief which has crossed the line of ordinary felony and takes rank with treason. I say that the man who beholds in his own community, in his own State, a lurking mischief like this and fails to raise his voice against it is unworthy of citizenship. It is the exposure of wrong, not the covering of it up, that prevents crime. That is the view which I take.

If these figures are true, what do they show? They write a chapter in the history of these United States that the representatives of foreign nations—yes, the most grinding despotisms in the world—could comment upon to our discredit and even to their credit.

What have we? A governor-elect and all of the State officers. Who is behind them? They used to say that we had only 120,000 ignorant negroes and 20,000 still worse white men. The fact is that the brains, the intelligence of the State are in the Republican party to-day. I ask who stands behind the Democratic machine? Not the negro, because the proposition was to disfranchise him. According to these returns the most unnatural, the most unreasonable proposition is presented that ever struck the human mind—that here is a race of people who voluntarily went up to the ballot box and voted to disfranchise themselves. Does any man believe that? I ask again who stands behind them? Not the white men, because the great majority of white men of the State voted the other way.

Take the county of Madison, in which our Senator resides. I believe there are only a few negroes there—how many?

A MEMBER. Sixty.

Mr. LINNEY. And how many white voters?

A MEMBER. Three thousand.

Mr. LINNEY. How many votes did the Democrats get? What was the Republican majority?

A MEMBER. Fifteen hundred.

Mr. LINNEY. Fifteen hundred in that big white county.

Take Wilkes and the other white counties, and wherever there is an overwhelming white majority the Republican party is certain to win. Why?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from North Carolina believe that the white people of those counties that he has referred to would commit such crimes as he has described, simply because they believe in free silver, or anti-imperialism, or any other doctrine of the Democratic party?

Mr. LINNEY. My dear sir, it is a mystery and a secret as great as the grave of Attila, the Scourge of God. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I asked the gentleman seriously.

Mr. LINNEY. I tell you frankly I do not know, and I now ask you a question. Do you believe that that vote in New Hanover and Halifax was honest?

Mr. SIMS. I simply take the gentleman's statement; but does not the gentleman know that there is a cause beyond mere politics, which is to prevent the negro from gaining control of local affairs?

Mr. LINNEY. I do not know any such thing, and I contend that Democracy is estopped, on the plainest principles of equity and fair play, from raising that question; because if the negro votes for them it is all right, and if they steal his vote it is all right. If it is lawful, then, for the Democracy to steal the negro votes and count them, in God's name, is it not lawful for the Republican party to count them when they honestly get them? [Laughter on the Republican side.] I will say to the distinguished gentleman that I am glad he put the question, and I will say to him now that the negro problem can be solved by a statute which I might not be able to draw, but which the gentleman can draw in ten minutes, so as to prevent any such thing as negro domination, if such a thing can ever exist in the State.

Pass a statute requiring every officer to give a bond such as may be considered right, signed by citizens of the county in which he lives, to be approved by the judge of the district. In that way you would get rid of all officers who are incompetent and all dishonest ones. But my Democratic brethren of North Carolina would never think of passing that law any more than they would think of retiring from politics altogether, because it would remove the negro question from State politics. In a State where the preponderance of white men is so great over the blacks this idea of negro domination is the merest rot, a scarecrow with which to frighten weak men.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman this question, because I am serious about it.

Mr. LINNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Why is it that these white people who would commit such crimes as you have mentioned against the election laws are not criminals in any other respect?

Mr. LINNEY. My friend, that is hard to tell. Why is it that this distinguished gentleman in North Carolina, whose character is as good as yours or mine, or that of anybody else, would answer a philosophic question put to him in that way, when asked the question, "How did you do it?" Now, the question is asked not how, but why. I answer, because of the love of power. There is nothing like it under the sun. Interest, says one of the great judges of this country, degrades the character of a witness or impeaches him. If a man has an interest in a farm and is litigating about it, judges consider that fact. Interest, like infamy, impeaches. And there is no interest like the love of power and the ambition for office. In the play of King Henry VIII, Wolsey's standard of human excellence is too high—

> My robe
> And my integrity to Heaven is all.

Honest, honorable men in all their other dealings and in their church relations in many instances will take the sacrament of the Lord's Supper the Sunday before the election on Tuesday, and then on Tuesday they have got very little more sense than a horsefly with its head off. [Laughter.] Such is the weakness of human nature, and such is the tremendous power in the incentive to evil deeds touching this struggle for power. Yes, Gray was right when he said that men will "wade through slaughter to a throne."

No charge to the man thirsting for office, or those whose hearts are cankered with partisan rancor, can make them "Fling away ambition; by that sin fell the angels." I have just received an interesting bit of unwritten history from one of the best men in North Carolina on this point. During the hot Presidential contest, a former candidate for governor in North Carolina declared: "I would vote for Bryan and against imperialism if I knew it would disfranchise me forever."

A few days ago, in an old-time Methodist love feast, this same great, good man, having thrown off all his political war paint, in reciting his religious experience and counseling his weaker brethren as to the duty of the church, declared that he could now see the hand of God in expansion. This gentleman is known to me to be one of the most intelligent citizens of North Carolina, and a zealous Christian. Wild to the point of frenzy on election day, he was a calm, philosophic, devout Christian in the house of God. Mr. Speaker, without law man is a tyrant, and if any laws guard him with a greater vigilance than others, it should be the laws protecting the ballot box; because here man is weakest in his capacity to withstand temptation. What, therefore, can be said of an election in any State where the only remedy against fraud, the writ of mandamus, has been repealed?

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LINNEY. Why, certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Has the Republican party ever nominated or elected or appointed to the supreme bench of North Carolina a negro?

Mr. LINNEY. Never in this world, my dear sir, and never will. They have more sense than that. They have no idea of doing any such thing; but I should not be at all surprised, whenever it becomes necessary, if the Democrats appoint a negro or a monkey, if necessary to pull them through. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LINNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. You stated that the love of power is the one motive which will induce men to commit political crime. Is there not just as much love of power among the people of other counties of North Carolina as well as other States, and is not that just as much of an inducement for them to commit wrong in order to get into power?

Mr. LINNEY. My dear sir, despotism must evermore be strengthening its fortresses. Liberty crushed will rise, you know, and therefore despotism not only tries to hold the vantage ground it has, but here every succeeding Democratic legislature is attempting to add to it. The last stone laid upon the fortress of their despotism is the striking down of that grand old writ of mandamus. Let me ask the gentleman, and I appeal to his conscience, and to his intelligence, and to his patriotism, I ask him to answer under the oath that he took here, was not the tearing down of the writ of mandamus the act of despotism?

Mr. SIMS. Is a law passed by all the people despotic?

Mr. LINNEY. I am asking the questions now. Was that despotic in your opinion, or not?

Mr. SIMS. The legislature of North Carolina passed the law.

Mr. LINNEY. The legislature of North Carolina, nine-tenths of the members, pledged the people their sacred honor, and I believe some filed affidavits, that they would not attempt to affect the franchise. They got in by false pretenses, and the very moment they got in then they turned their backs upon the people and submitted these measures, the purpose of which was to make more intricate and complicated the election machinery, and give them the opportunity of increasing their agencies for the ignoble purpose of destroying their honorable adversaries.

Mr. SIMS. Now, let me ask the gentleman one more question, and I will not worry him further.

Mr. LINNEY. It does not worry me at all.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask him, if there was not a negro in North Carolina does he believe that law would ever have been passed?

Mr. LINNEY. If there had not been a negro there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LINNEY. Well, if there had not been a Democrat there I am satisfied it would not. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And I will go further. If every voter in the State had been a negro, even then it never would have been passed. Nobody but a Democrat and a Democratic organization was equal to the task of repealing that grand writ of mandamus. The Republican party has pleaded for it, is pleading for it now, and is now asking the legislature of North Carolina to repeal its action. Will they do it? I undertake to say no; but there are threats now that they will impeach the judges.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the gentleman was making a serious speech on a grave social question and not simply a political speech, or I should not have asked him the question.

Mr. LINNEY. I am not simply making a political speech. I am proceeding on the question whether anybody has been disfranchised in North Carolina, and calling attention to the fact that if anybody has been disfranchised there, the gentleman himself is bound by the oath he has taken to afford us a remedy.

That is why I am making this speech. I do not like to advocate this measure, but I have taken an oath, as my friend has, and I say to him calmly and dispassionately, with all the solemnity of which I am capable, and with all the solemnity with which I ever uttered anything, that it will trouble my friend or anybody else to escape the conclusion that there rests upon his soul and mine an obligation to the law, an obligation before high heaven, to furnish a remedy for these outrageous proceedings.

I feel it as a citizen of North Carolina. You do not. It is hard for you to believe that any such condition could exist. It is hard for you to believe that in any portion of that grand Republic, where manhood has been elevated by the influence of the system that we have and where Christianity exists, men could have resorted to any such means as these figures conclusively show they have. And yet it is true. Now, gentlemen, unless we stir up these sleeping lions of the Constitution to which I have called your attention, the power and duty of Congress to see that each State is guaranteed a republican form of government and the duty of Congress in making its apportionment to see that when citizens are deprived of their rights the representation shall be reduced—I say unless we stir up these sleeping lions of the Constitution, then there is no remedy. They have rested for a century.

The last one has slept for a quarter of a century, but the first one, in the fourth article, has rested there for a hundred years, sleeping like an innocent babe. Never until now has the writ of mandamus been repealed, and never until now has any one of the thirteen original States of this Union attempted to destroy the remedy whereby the purity of the ballot box could be maintained. Having done that, the time has come when the voice of this Congress, stronger than the voice of thunder, should stir up these sleeping lions and invoke their power in preserving the integrity of the State of North Carolina and the other States, if there be any that have been guilty of these infractions.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. You have spoken of the election laws in North Carolina. I will ask you if there is not at present a Republican governor of the State?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. He was elected in 1896, and I will ask if he was not elected under Democratic election laws?

Mr. LINNEY. He was elected under the other law, on the combination ticket. He was elected after the Democratic law was repealed in 1895.

Mr. SMALL. He was elected under the law which passed the fusion legislature?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, sir; he carried your county by 1,300.

Mr. SMALL. I will ask if the Republican legislature that was elected in 1894 passed that legislation?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Was not that election under a Democratic election law?

Mr. LINNEY. I believe so. That is, the election of 1894 was under a Democratic law.

Mr. SMALL. How was it possible, then, if it was violated?

Mr. LINNEY. I believe in that election they carried your own county by 1,300.

Mr. SMALL. What county is that you speak of?

Mr. LINNEY. I beg your pardon. You do not live there, but equally as good a man does.

Mr. SMALL. I live in Beaufort County. Do you say it was that county?

Mr. LINNEY. Oh, no; I am talking about New Hanover. I made a mistake. You favor your distinguished brother so much that I can not tell you apart. You have both been attending Democratic conventions so long that you have become assimilated one with the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. That is not answering me. But I will ask the gentleman another question. You have made some charges against the election laws and the administration of them in North Carolina. I wish to ask you if you have any reference to the First Congressional district—my district?

Mr. LINNEY. I have not examined. What district do you represent? What big negro counties have you in your district?

Mr. SMALL. My district is composed of the counties of Beaufort, Camden, Carteret, Chowan, Currituck, Dare, Gates, Hertford, Hyde, Martin, Pamlico, Pasquotank, Perquimans, Pitt, Tyrrell, and Washington—16 counties.

Mr. LINNEY. Do you know what the negro population of that district is?

Mr. SMALL. I do not know; they do not have a majority.

Mr. LINNEY. Well, you may have squeezed through by leaving hair on both sides of the hole without stealing. How that is I do not know. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. I desire to interrupt the gentleman further to say that he has not answered my question.

Mr. LINNEY. I am answering your question.

Mr. SMALL. I wish to ask the gentleman if he intends to intimate that there was any stealing of votes or any maladministration in the First Congressional district?

Mr. LINNEY. Except that I suspect that some one used the lubricating oil for running the machine.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to know whether you make any such charge.

Mr. LINNEY. I believe there was a systematic fraud throughout every county in the State that has 50 per cent of its population in negroes; but as to this particular case I have not examined.

Mr. SMALL. In no one of these 16 counties, then, you do not make any charge of frauds?

Mr. LINNEY. The inference I make is founded on the official returns. How it is done is a hidden mystery deeper than the grave of Attila, "the Scourge of God." The figures can not be questioned. I have not seen the witnesses, except those figures in the returns.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman think it is fair to make a charge on the floor of this House against a State or any section of a State without proof to show by saying it is a mystery which he can not explain?

Mr. LINNEY. I have my proof in this instance appearing on the face of the returns. I have stated generally in these negro counties, and proved it from the record, there were 2 Republican votes only where there were 26,000 citizens. I will ask you, was not that a fraud?

Mr. SMALL. In what county does the gentleman say that took place?

Mr. LINNEY. In New Hanover.

Mr. SMALL. I do not know of any fraud committed in New Hanover.

Mr. LINNEY. Having stated the facts from the returns, state whether it was not fraud. Gird up your loins and answer me like a man, my friend. How is that? [Great laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. I desire to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. LINNEY. I will not be interrupted further.

Mr. SMALL. I will not interrupt the gentleman against his wish.

Mr. LINNEY. I do not want to stir up any more bad blood with the people in the East. God knows there has been enough of that already.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. You do not make any charge against the First district?

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, tyranny and despotism can always assign plausible reasons for their action whenever the elective franchise is unjustly assailed. The excuse given is to protect intelligence against ignorance; to uphold white supremacy against negro domination. A Democratic partisan can easily imagine that there is very little intelligence in a Republican community, and a Republican partisan is not likely to see all the intelligence in the Democratic camp. I believe that the white race in North Carolina is superior to the black race. I shall strive to protect the white voter of the West from the effects of vicious methods at the polls in the black belt. All electors should be protected in these sacred rights. The enforcement of the law is the only hope of our common country. Quite an intelligent Democrat from the black belt came into the white belt of the State, where Republicanism flourishes. He went away with a better opinion of his white Republican brother, as is seen from the following clipping from the Post:

Representative BELLAMY, of North Carolina, is widely traveled and cultured, and appreciates the beauties of his own country. "I have traveled," he said, "over a good portion of Europe. I have looked upon the picturesque scenery of Switzerland, grand and inspiring. During the past summer I spent but little time in my own district, obeying the wishes of the party managers that I speak in the western section of the State and tell them from the stump something about the conditions in our own section of Tar Heeldom. Thus I had an opportunity to revisit the mountain section of North Carolina near the Tennessee line, and I convinced myself that there is no more beautiful scenery in the world than that locality affords. I campaigned through the wonderful Johns River Valley and visited the Blowing Rock, where you can look down 2,000 feet and can drop your coat or your hat and see it sink a couple of hundred feet and then be whisked suddenly upward—I was going to say back upon your head or your shoulders—but it comes back again to where you are standing. The people there have more civilization than they are usually credited with. The men served in the Union armies during the civil war, and in many sections have steadfastly remained Republicans since that time."

Yes; the white Republicans of Johns River Valley know how to treat a political adversary. As a rule the Republicans of this valley are splendid representatives of all the human excellencies belonging to a great race. Many of them displayed the great qualities of the hero in the late war between the States. Most of them were soldiers in the Confederate army, and followed Lee and Jackson. Some of them adhered to the side of the Union at great sacrifice. They heard the classic orator of the east with interest and that respect which commanded his approval: but in the exercise of the best human intelligence they said by their votes we do not agree with you. I indulge the belief, in common with my Republican associates of the white belt of North Carolina, that if our Democratic brethren of the black belt will come amongst us they will see more in the white communities of the west to admire.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Crumpacker bill is not perfect. For the first time many of the Republican members of the North have shown a disposition to enforce the constitutional remedies for the protection of all the citizens of all the States against the schemes of ambitious partisans. The Crumpacker bill is too narrow. It will be unjust to North Carolina and all the other States embraced in it to cut down their representation while there are other States equally delinquent to which it does not apply. I hope to see it so improved as to apply the remedy to all the offending States in that form. I would cheerfully vote for it as the very best proportion. Should we fail to apply the remedy now, ten years must elapse before another opportunity. I consider the Burleigh bill as coming nearer meeting the marvelous increased citizenship and diversified interests of the Republic than the Hopkins bill. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, the members of this House are well aware of the fact that I make no pretensions to oratory. During my membership in this body I have been content to attend strictly to the work of my constituents in the ordinary channels, and have not often trespassed upon your time and patience upon this floor. To-day, however, we have pending a matter which is not only of very grave importance to the people of my own State, whom I have the honor to represent here in part, but also to the American people as a whole, who have a right to be interested in a measure which concerns both the extent and the adequacy of their representation in this Capitol. Entertaining decided convictions upon this subject, and having devoted to its consideration no little time and thought, I can not permit this opportunity to pass without putting upon record the conclusions I have reached.

Before proceeding to any general discussion of the two bills presented by the majority and minority, respectively, of the Census Committee, I desire to review briefly the general features of each. Both are based upon the computations of the Census Office and follow the general method which has there been in vogue since 1840. The majority bill provides for 357 Representatives, the method employed by the committee in apportioning the same being clearly stated in its report, as follows:

The plan adopted in making the apportionment is to divide the constitutional population of the United States, as reported to your committee by the Director of the Census, by 357, the proposed membership of the House. The quotient, 208,868, is the ratio of Representatives to population. This ratio is applied in succession to the population of each State. This ratio applied in this manner to the population of each State will yield in the aggregate a number somewhat less than 357, the number determined upon as the membership of the House. The difference, however, is made up by assigning to the States having the largest major fractions additional Representatives until a sufficient number of Representatives has been assigned to make up the total number previously agreed upon, namely, 357.

By this computation all the States having majority fractions are accorded additional representation therefor except the three given in the list which I here submit:

State.	Representatives apportioned.	Majority fraction.
Colorado	2	121,307
North Dakota	1	105,586

I do not purpose to dwell upon the obvious injustice which excludes these three States from their rightful participation in the apportionment or the vagaries that grow out of this method of dealing with majority fractions. I will simply invite the attention of the members of this House to the computations shown in Table 3 of the apportionment figures submitted by the Census Office, and ask them to note how different States dodge in and out of the loss column, with different ratios, through the variations in these majority fractions. My own State, for instance, which would hold its present representation with a membership of 383, loses one on a membership of 386, holds its present quota with 385, and loses again on a membership of 389, although in each instance it has a substantial majority fraction.

A method of computation which permits such uncertainties as this is so obviously unjust that no time need be wasted in its discussion. I am firmly convinced that the only fair and equitable way of dealing with such majority fractions is to use all States exactly alike and to accord to every one of them which has such a fraction an additional Representative. This view prevailed in 1872 and is held by the six members of the Census Committee who signed the minority report. This report is based primarily upon a membership of 384 Representatives, with a resulting ratio of 194,182. Applying this ratio to the several States in the manner already described, it is found that Nebraska and Virginia are the only States having majority fractions which fail to secure additional representation therefor. A Representative is therefore accorded each of them, and thus full and substantial justice is secured to every State in the Union upon the broad basis of equal rights.

The table which I here submit summarizes the general results aimed at in each of these pending measures.

Permit me to say at the outset that I do not believe it is a wise policy to ignore the growth of this great country of ours by needlessly limiting its popular representation. The closer the individual citizen is brought in touch with the conduct of national affairs, and the easier it is for him to impress his views upon those who make the nation's laws, the more in harmony it is with the spirit of republican institutions and the stronger and better will be the character of the public service. Although I have read carefully many of the arguments pro and con that have entered into the consideration of former apportionment bills, and have listened patiently to all that has been said in favor of the measure reported by the gentleman from Illinois, I have yet to find one single cogent or convincing reason adduced why the number of Representatives in this House should not in some degree keep pace with the growth of the country in population and material resources.

The Constitution simply provides that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers." The determination, therefore, of the number of members who shall constitute this House rests wholly with Congress. The measure which will be enacted into law as a result of our present deliberations will fix the extent of popular representation in Washington for the next ten years. It is of special importance, therefore, that in performing this duty it be with an eye single to the interests of the whole country. It should also be with a just appreciation of the fact that large as this Republic is to-day in population and in the scope and magnitude of its material interests, it is probably destined to an even greater growth and development during the period in which the new apportionment will be operative. Not only are the members of Congress during the next decade to legislate for the interests of the people who claimed their undivided attention during nearly all of the decade that has passed, but, as a result of the war with Spain and the annexation of Hawaii, they will be called upon to legislate for 11,000,000 additional people, occupying about 134,000 square miles of territory.

And how shall we best meet the demands upon the time and attention of Congress that will come from these possessions, from the large increase of population in our own country, and from the constantly extending and diversifying interests that grow naturally out of the complexities of our modern life and continually impose new burdens upon those charged with the responsibilities of legislation? Certainly not by holding at its present number the membership of this House when every one of us to-day has all and quite all he can efficiently do in attending to the needs of his already large constituency. In view of existing conditions it is simply preposterous to further burden the busy members of this branch of the Government by requiring them to care for the needs of over 13,000,000 more people than they were originally intended to represent. Moreover, it would be an exceedingly shortsighted policy to leave out of consideration the very large increase in population which may reasonably be looked for before the close of the present decade. Our action upon this important subject may well accord to the members of this House larger rather than smaller opportunities for the careful consideration of measures affecting the public welfare and for the exacting duties of constructive legislation.

I believe that the present House has been too small for the achievement of the best results in legislative work and that the larger legislative bodies of the leading European countries have some notable points of advantage. The larger the membership the better service will be given the public and the more difficult it becomes for any measure appropriating money to run the legislative gantlet. With a small membership logrolling schemes for the depletion of the Treasury are always possible; but the difficulties attending the success of such combinations increase in strong ratio with the enlargement of the membership. Large bodies are not easily corrupted.

They are always in closer touch with the masses and respond more quickly to popular conviction. The confidence which a people feel in a legislative body rests in no small degree upon the strength of its membership and the wide diversity of the interests represented. There is nothing which constitutes so strong a bulwark of honest government as the fierce light of publicity which beats through a large membership in a popular legislative branch upon every measure for the expenditure of the public money. Representatives in such an assembly are directly from the people and accountable to them for the manner in which they discharge the important trusts confided to their keeping.

The work of a Representative in this House has increased vastly during the last few years, which have witnessed a stupendous growth of our country in all departments of material progress. A statement recently issued from the Treasury Department calls attention to the astounding fact that the excess of our exports over our imports for the fiscal years 1898, 1899, and 1900 was nearly five times as great as the total of such excess for the previous one hundred and seven years of our country's history. The United States has become a recognized world power. In every avenue of industrial enterprise the American people have pushed out in recent years with an energy and a grasp that have been at once the wonder and the admiration of the world. All this growth and development has put additional work upon the representatives of the people in this capital, and the whole tendency of the times has been to load the members of this House with a burden of detail which has steadily narrowed the time which they were physically able to give to the great national questions constantly coming up and calling for close and careful attention.

I know that there is always a tendency in a legislative body, especially among those who have had long experience in its service and who have been more or less intrusted with the direction of its affairs, to guard jealously its powers and privileges, to be distrustful of changes, and to cling tenaciously to the old established order of things. While this feeling is not unnatural, it may readily be carried to extremes, and when it reaches a point where those who entertain it are willing to overlook or ignore the facts of progress it may easily become an impediment or a menace to the public welfare. The movement for a contracted House of Representatives—an assembly making no attempt to keep pace with the nation's growth and needs—has had, so far as I have observed, its source and its inspiration in this Capitol and not with the American people. The people of this country demand and they ought to have adequate and efficient representation here, and every measure that tends to widen the distance between the individual citizen and his Representative in Washington is a contraction of popular power and privilege and out of harmony with the spirit of our institutions.

So far from being a source of weakness a strong popular assembly is a source of strength, as the experience of other nations has amply demonstrated.

I submit the following table, showing the representation in a number of the leading countries of the world and the ratio which it bears in each instance to population:

Country.	Population.	Membership in lower House.	Membership in upper House.	Ratio of representation to actual population.
England	37,888,439	670	479	53,392
France	38,517,975	584	300	65,955
Germany	52,279,901	397	58	124,505
Italy	29,699,785	508	300	57,000
Spain	17,550,216	431	360	50,000
Canada	4,823,875	213	81	22,688
United States	76,304,799	357	90	213,739

The comparisons afforded by these figures are certainly striking. We have been so accustomed to think of our land as the home of liberty, and so gradual has been the official usurpation of popular power, that it is somewhat startling for us to come face to face with the fact that there is not to-day a single constitutional monarchy in all Europe whose people do not enjoy vastly more power in national legislation than is possessed by the citizens of the United States. Take a member of the English House of Commons, a member of the French Chamber of Deputies, a member of the lower House of the Spanish Cortes, and a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, and their combined constituency is but 226,347—only 17,479 more than the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois purposes to give to a single Representative of the great American people!

The House of Commons, it will be seen, has a membership of 670, representing a resident population of 37,888,439—less than one-half the total population of the United States—and it stands before the world to-day as one of the most incorruptible legislative bodies on the face of the earth, amply justifying in this regard the encomium of Sir William Blackstone in his masterly Commentaries. For more than six hundred years—almost, in fact, from the days of Magna Charta itself—it has been the recognized bulwark of English liberties. It is not the movements toward democracy which our country need fear, but rather those that tend to rob the masses of the elements of sovereignty—to take from them, little by little, as the majority bill reported from the Census Committee purposes to do, their representative strength, and gradually concentrate in the hands of the few the power that belongs to the many. During the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, when the apportionment bill based upon the Tenth Census was under consideration, Representative Tillman referred to this tendency toward the absorption of power in our own country, as compared with the growing democracy of the countries of the Old World, in language which the conditions of to-day merely emphasize and which is as applicable to the present discussion as to the one of which it formed a part. He said:

> Besides England, there are the other nations on the Continent that enjoy and have long enjoyed constitutional representative governments, most of the time for several centuries. These are Switzerland, Belgium, and Holland (the Netherlands). At this time every 45,000 inhabitants of Holland have a representative in the National Legislature; about every 43,000 people of Belgium also have a representative in Parliament, while in Switzerland there is a representative for every 20,000 of the population. When we reflect on the large representation of the people in each of these three free States, and when we also remember that about every 53,000 Englishmen have an organ and a vote in Parliament, while only every 170,000 Americans have a representative in Congress, ought it to surprise anyone that we should frequently hear the remark in conversation, or read it in the newspapers, that government in Europe is becoming more democratic every day, while in America it is tending more to the aristocratic or one-man power?
> Power is ever seeking its own increase, and political power especially has a constant tendency to steal from the many to the few, to guard against which our English ancestors, who have been slowly but steadily improving in their Government for the last five hundred years, have during all that time been in favor of a large House of Commons. Since the days of the Stuarts, England and Wales alone have had about 500 members in the Commons. At the union with Scotland, nearly two hundred years ago, 45 other representatives were added for that country, and at the union with Ireland, at the beginning of the present century, still another 100 were added for her quota; since which time the Commons has never had less than 650 members, although several acts reforming Parliament as to suffrage and constituencies have been passed.
> Thus, while representation in the Commons of Great Britain has never been less than one member for every 53,000 inhabitants, which is the ratio to-day, the people of the United States have not had as much representation as that in their National Legislature since forty years ago. Each member on this floor now represents over three times as many inhabitants as a member of the House of Commons.
> Hence England may be said from the very start to have established a maximum representation of her people to protect them against the encroachments of wealth, the designs of demagogues, or the assaults of ambition, while the United States, on the other hand, may be said to have commenced with a minimum of representation and to have adhered to it, at least since 1832.

There can be little doubt but what while the English House of Commons has been a sturdy and incorruptible conservator of the people's interests, its legislative efficiency would be considerably increased by the rules which obtain in this body and which insure the orderly progress of business however large its membership may be. We are legislating primarily for our own day and generation, and there is no reason to suppose that those who are to come after us will not be fully able to deal with any conditions that may confront them. No generation has ever had a mortgage upon the universal intelligence either within or without the circle of its own activities.

If we shall increase the membership of the House as provided in the bill presented here by 6 of the 13 members of the Census Committee it will still require nearly one hundred years of similar increase at each succeeding apportionment before this branch of Congress will equal in size the present membership of the English House of Commons. It will require nearly seventy years of similar decennial progress before we shall reach the present membership of the French Chamber of Deputies. Nor should we for one moment in this connection lose sight of the important fact that the population represented by these bodies in each instance is only about one-half as large as that represented by this House. I submit here a table showing the general basis of apportionment from the foundation of our Government down to the present time, including the proposals of the majority and minority bills for the apportionment under the Twelfth Census:

Under.	Census.		Apportionment.		Whole number of Representatives.
	Year.	Population.	Year.	Ratio.
Constitution			1789	30,000	65
First Census	1790	3,929,214	1793	33,000	105
Second Census	1800	5,308,483	1803	33,000	141
Third Census	1810	7,239,881	1813	35,000	181
Fourth Census	1820	9,638,822	1823	40,000	213
Fifth Census	1830	12,866,020	1833	47,700	240
Sixth Census	1840	17,069,453	1843	70,680	223
Seventh Census	1850	23,191,876	1853	93,423	233
Eighth Census	1860	31,443,321	1863	127,381	241
Ninth Census	1870	38,558,371	1873	131,425	283
Tenth Census	1880	50,155,783	1883	151,911	325
Eleventh Census	1890	62,622,250	1893	173,901	356
Twelfth Census:
Majority bill	1900	74,565,906	1903	208,868	357
Minority bill	1900	74,565,906	1903	194,182	386

It will be seen from these figures that after every apportionment in the history of this country, with one single exception, occurring more than half a century ago, and for which the Senate of that time was responsible, there has been an increase in the number of members in this House, in order that it might, in some measure, keep pace with the increasing numbers and needs of the people. In no single instance, however, has such an increase been made when it failed to invoke the frantic objections of men who conjured up all sorts of bugaboos that were to come from it. Some of them have even gone so far as to profess to see in such increase of popular representation grave dangers to the Republic! How absurd those needless fears, that uncalled for and foolish distrust of the people, appear to-day when read in the light of history! The verdict which we pass upon them now will be the verdict of the future upon the arguments of those who now seek to stay the progress of this House in its efforts to keep abreast of the country's growth and needs, if the substitute measure reported by the minority of the Census Committee shall receive your sanction.

And what are the arguments advanced in the majority report of the committee? I find but two, namely, "economy" and "dispatch of business." It scarcely seems possible that anyone will seriously contend here that the small additional expense that would be occasioned by the increase of membership contemplated by the substitute bill should constitute an insuperable obstacle to giving the people of this country the representation in Washington rendered imperatively necessary by their increased requirements. The American masses can far better afford to expend a few more thousand dollars a year than they can to face the vastly greater loss that would come to them from a further needless and arbitrary concentration of official power in national affairs.

So far as the "dispatch of business" is concerned, there is no objection which can possibly be urged against 386 members, or for that matter 395 members, on the score of unwieldiness which could not be urged with equal force and truth against the present number of Representatives. No fair-minded man will for a moment question but what the rules which have been found necessary to the orderly transaction of business under existing conditions would operate equally well with a membership considerably in excess of our present one. The membership of this House, as a matter of fact, long ago outgrew the conditions which made it possible for each individual member to participate to whatever extent he might desire in its discussions—a privilege which is with much difficulty, under the great pressure of present-day conditions, secured to United States Senators.

As a matter of fact, those who favor a reduction in the people's representation at the national capital are somewhat put to it to find serious arguments against the proposed increase of 29 members. Even the asserted lack of capacity in this Hall for such a contemplated increase—that prodigious argument with which the advocates of a contracted representation have sought in vain to fortify themselves in the last two apportionments—is unavailing now. I confess that I have had the temerity to suppose that the needs of a great people might be permitted even to override the limitations of partition walls; that the Capitol itself is intended to accommodate the people, and not the people to accommodate the Capitol. But, fortunately for the peace of mind of these gentlemen, the increase of membership contemplated in the bill reported by the minority of the Census Committee involves no enlargement of this Hall.

A plan prepared by the Architect of the Capitol shows that such additional members can amply be provided for within its present limitations. Bereft of this old-time rock of refuge, our opponents are perforce driven to solicitude for the future. "If," they say, "you keep on in the decades of the future increasing the membership of this House to render it in some degree commensurate with the growth of the country, the time will come, alas, when we or our descendants will be brought face to face with the dire necessity of moving these partition walls!" Well, possibly; but this terrible contingency is not yet upon us, nor need we cross any bridges until we get to them. We are only asked at this time to legislate in the light of present-day conditions for the next ten years. Those who come after us may reasonably be depended upon to meet the requirements of the future wisely and well. There is also more than an equal chance that the growing lack of veneration may by that time prove a saving grace.

The proposition to hold the total membership of this body where it is for another ten years, or, in other words, to require that its members, each of whom during the past decade has represented here about 174,000 inhabitants, shall represent about 209,000 people each during the present decade, is practically equivalent to a reduction of 72 members in the representation which the people of this great country with all their gain in numbers and the multiplication of interests demanding the attention of Congress are to have at the national capital during the next ten years.

The bill reported by 6 of the 13 members of the committee, while it takes care of the legitimate interests of every State in the Union and deprives none of them of existing representation, increases the total membership of this House but 29, a number by no means unprecedented. The increase in 1870 was 42, although the gain in population was little more than one-half of what it has been in the decade just closed. The same increase was made again in 1880, while in the apportionment of 1890 the increase was 31, 2 more than that called for by the bill reported by the minority of the Census Committee, notwithstanding the fact that our growth in population and in wealth between 1890 and 1900 was greater than in any previous decade of the country's history. This bill amply provides for all the growing interests of the country and avoids the gross injustice of depriving States which have increased in population in the past decade of representation now enjoyed, and which was based upon the smaller population of ten years ago.

Nothing can be fairly urged as a just and sufficient reason for depriving any State of existing representation save a substantial falling off in the population upon which it was originally based. We are not confronted at this time by any such contingency. Under the bill reported by the chairman of the Census Committee 8 States of the Union—Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, and Virginia—are deprived of representation which they have had during the past decade, and yet not a single one of these States has failed during that period to make a substantial increase in its population. I submit in this connection a table showing the amount of such increase in each of these States:

State.	Population.		Increase.
	1890.	1900.
Indiana	2,192,404	2,516,462	324,058
Kansas	1,427,096	1,470,495	43,399
Kentucky	1,858,635	2,147,174	288,539
Maine	661,086	694,466	33,380
Nebraska	1,058,910	1,068,539	9,629
Ohio	3,672,316	4,157,545	485,229
South Carolina	1,151,149	1,340,316	189,167
Virginia	1,655,980	1,854,184	198,204
Total	13,677,576	15,249,181	1,571,605

I invite special attention to the totals here shown. It will be seen that the total increase of population for the decade in the 8 States which the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois purposes to deprive of present representation is 1,571,605, which is nearly one-eighth of the total increase in population in the whole country during the same period.

Never was a measure presented to the consideration of this House more unwise in its policy, more needlessly unjust in its provisions, or more arbitrary in its purpose than the one now pending for the further concentration of official power in the nation. By its provisions it deprives 8 States of the Union, comprising one-fifth of the total population of this country—States which have gained a million and a half in population in the last ten years—of 8 Representatives at the national capital which were accorded them ten years ago.

I submit in all fairness that if 80 members of this House were necessary for the adequate representation of those States ten years ago, when they had but 13,677,576 population—and I do not think any man will question such necessity—it is a rank injustice to reduce that representation to 72 at this time, when their aggregate population has reached 15,249,181. The substitute bill presented by the minority of the Census Committee deprives no State of existing representation, while at the same time it cheerfully concedes to Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, North Dakota, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Minnesota, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, New York, and Texas that increased power in the councils of the nation that rightly belongs to them as a result of their gain in population.

If the eight States so unjustly discriminated against in the majority report had lost in population during the decade, there might have been some reason for depriving their citizens of so large a proportion of the representative rights which they have hitherto enjoyed in this Capitol, but in view of their absolute gain of one million and a half in population the majority bill is not only a measure absolutely without justification, but one which inflicts an uncalled-for wrong upon a large proportion of the citizens of this country. We are met here with a propositon not only to ignore the needs of a growing population and of multiplied and diversified interests by retaining the same representation through two decades, but we are asked also, as a crowning act of legislative vandalism, to loot part of the representation of States which have enjoyed a steady and substantial growth in wealth and population.

I believe that the majority bill, that turns its back upon practically all the precedents of the past, and not only deprives 18 great States of this Union of the increased representation which should rightfully come to them by their growth in population, but robs 8 other great States of the Union of representation established ten years ago upon a smaller population, has no right to pose in this Hall as a measure for the promotion of the public interests. It might with more propriety be entitled "A measure to deprive the American people of adequate representation at the national capital."

I firmly believe that no member of this House should be required to look after the interests of more people than it is possible to give a proper amount of individual attention. It is desirable not only that a Congressman should be in close and sympathetic touch with every part of his district, but also that it should not be beyond the range of possibility for him to know personally the majority of the voters who make up his constituency. Such an acquaintance and such a close knowledge of the needs of his district is not only essential to the highest type of representation, but constitutes the strongest safeguard which this Government can have against all forms of political jobbery and corruption. The people desire more than faithful service. They demand and they are entitled to have efficient service, and that kind of service you render to a large extent impossible when you so enlarge the population of a legislative district as to make it a difficult matter for the individual citizen to reach the ear of Congress.

In 1789 every 30,000 people in the United States had a Representative in this House, who usually enjoyed a personal acquaintance with practically all of the people of his district. This, too, was at a time when the conditions of the country were simple and the members of Congress, being largely free from the burden of the details which have grown out of the diversity of present-day affairs, were enabled to give a much closer scrutiny to and study of the great questions that came up for solution. To-day a member of Congress represents in round numbers 174,000 people, and so great are the demands upon his time that it is difficult indeed for him to find opportunity for the careful consideration of general measures of legislation. I do not believe that any move calculated to unnecessarily accentuate this condition of affairs is either desired by the American people or in accord with a wise and progressive public policy.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation incorporating the Washington Telephone Company in the District of Columbia; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented the petition of Charles Webber and 18 other citizens of Harrison County, Ind., and the petition of John W. McCarty and 51 other citizens of Stones Crossing, Ind., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ADDITIONAL REPORT ON INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to submit an additional report to accompany the bill (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. I move that it be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I also ask unanimous consent that the report I have just submitted may be bound in paper, inasmuch as it is very voluminous and otherwise pages would be likely to get lost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be bound in paper.

COURTS IN IOWA.

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the report I am about to make. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12447) to amend an act approved June 1, A. D. 1900, entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein," to report it without amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered. It is a local bill and of some importance, as it affects our courts. It will take but a moment.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESERVATIONS FOR PURPOSES OF INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 145) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1901, and so forth, to report it favorably without amendment and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will ask that the letter of the president of the Board of Commissioners be read. It will explain the matter. This is the usual measure passed prior to inauguration, and it is almost word for word the same that was passed four years ago.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does not affect matters in the District of Columbia except for the purposes of the inauguration, as I understood from the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is true.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 3, 1901.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are advised by the chairman of the committee on legislation of the committee on inaugural ceremonies that the committee proposes to request the reenactment of the joint resolution approved February 6, 1897, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1897, etc," providing that the amount of $10,000 be asked for instead of $8,200, as in the former resolution, for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property.

The Commissioners recommend the enactment of the proposed legislation so far as it contemplates the imposition of special duties upon them, and especially concur in the proposed increase of the amount of the appropriation for the protection of the public. The increase in the number of people who will be in attendance, owing to the growth of population in the District and the influx of strangers which the event to be celebrated will induce, render the proposed increase in the appropriation a very moderate one for the service it is intended to provide.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. MACFARLAND,
President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the passage of the joint resolution, but I wish to take this occasion to say, from a pretty long experience, that I believe it would be found practicable to afford some shelter to the crowds who gather at the inauguration to hear the inaugural address of the President in the open air on the east front of the Capitol, by a temporary structure with a roof which can be taken away and perhaps saved for the next four years after it has been used, or at least by some structure which will break the force of a high wind.

I have witnessed now seven or eight inaugurations. Two or three of them have been under circumstances which have occasioned great loss of life and great injury to health—injury to the health of thousands of persons and loss of life of hundreds of persons, I have no doubt. The second inaugration of President Grant and the inauguration of President Harrison were among them. At the second inauguration of President Grant the West-point cadets stood for hours exposed to one of the most savage storms known in the history of Washington, and several of the boys lost their lives, sooner or later, from the exposure on that day.

Now, that goes on year after year. People come here from all parts of the country; they are eager at any rate to witness that most sublime of all human ceremonies, and it seems to me that the genius of the architects of the country and the wisdom of the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to be applied to the solution of that problem, making the inauguration ceremonial safe no matter what the weather may be.

I do not wish to delay the Senate at this time, but I wish to emphasize that thought now.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to amend the joint resolution by adding at the end, on page 5, the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no temporary tracks shall be laid upon or over any of the parks of the city.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why only one telegraph company, the Western Union, is mentioned in the joint resolution?

Mr. McMILLAN. I suppose the service of only one is required for this purpose. There is no objection to putting in the other if it is desired, but that one is all the Commissioners asked for.

Mr. BUTLER. If there is no objection, then, I move to insert on page 4, line 19, after the words "Western Union Telegraph Company," the words "and the Postal Telegraph Company."

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALLS BY THE SENATE ON EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day and calls the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to it. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BACON on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That any and every public document, paper, or record on the files of any Department of the Government relating to any subject whatever over which Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution is subject to the call or inspection of the Senate for its use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask as a matter of courtesy to myself that the resolution may lie on the table, in order that I may call it up and submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection that that course should be taken, subject, however, to the motion, whenever the resolution comes up, to refer it to the committee which I have indicated.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator has the right to make that motion without any reservation on his part at this time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the reservation simply because I should like to have it understood, as far as I can by any action of mine now, that if I am not in the Senate Chamber at the time, the motion is to be made.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the resolution and the motion go over together.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the Senator making the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table—subject to his call in the morning hour?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. And the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island will also go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. The motion for reference goes with it. Let the whole matter go over, the motion for reference as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Rhode Island made the motion to refer?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have made a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is also asked that the motion for reference shall take the same course.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection. It will be practically the same thing at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PAYMENTS TO SISSETON AND WAHPETON INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a copy of all recommendations, requests, and papers on file in relation to the payment of money belonging to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians to said Indians since November 6, 1900, and to inform the Senate whether he informed said Indians, or any of them, or any other person, previous to November 6 that he would make said payment after that date.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask leave to amend the resolution by striking out the words "he informed said," in line 6, and inserting "whether any official assurances were made to said."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has modified his resolution. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

REPORT OF ABRAHAM L. LAWSHE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Secretary of War, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 19th of December, 1900, requesting the Secretary of War to send to the Senate the report of Abraham L. Lawshe in relation to the receipts and expenditures in Cuba, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This resolution relates to the same subject-matter as the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I therefore ask that it may lie on the table and follow his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make the same request that the Senator from Georgia made?

Mr. SPOONER. I make the same motion that the Senator from Rhode Island made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To refer to what committee?

Mr. SPOONER. To the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let it follow the same course, then, as the resolution of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SPOONER. The resolution and the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table subject to his call in the morning hour, and that the motion to refer to the Judiciary Committee shall take the same course. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment under consideration would be on page 27, touching the veterinary corps. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], who is interested in that amendment, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is also interested in it, asked that it might be further passed over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no objection to waiting for a while.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the hearings that were had before the Committee on Military Affairs have been printed for the use of the Senate. They are not on my desk, and I have not had an opportunity to see them.

Mr. SEWELL. They have been printed for some days.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am informed that the reports have been printed, and also that the package has been sent to the document room. Whether copies have been laid on Senators' desks I am not sure.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that they were ordered printed, I think, on Saturday.

Mr. MONEY. I did not hear what the Senator from South Dakota proposed. I should be glad if he would repeat it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He simply inquired whether or not the hearings before the committee had been printed, and was informed that they have been printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator from South Dakota desire to speak on the veterinary amendment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have a copy of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, but it is not printed for the use of the Senate. There seems to have been a very limited number of these copies. An order was made to print a thousand copies, I understand, for the use of the Senate, but it embraces only a part of the hearings. There is no information so far, official or otherwise, of the necessity for this enlarged Army, and I have been seeking information on that subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is all printed. The whole of the evidence relating to the veterinary corps is in print.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But not for the use of the Senate. There was a limited number for the exclusive use of the committee printed, but that is not enough to supply the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that copies have been printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The order embraced only one of them. There are two pamphlets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an order made for printing two documents for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What I want to know is whether it has been printed so that we can get it or not. I have one of the committee's copies, that is all. But there is another pamphlet of hearings before the committee which has not been printed for the use of the Senate. It seems to me that we are illy prepared to go on with the bill without this information. There ought to be somewhere some information with regard to the necessity for this enlarged Army. If there has been testimony taken before the committee which shows the necessity for it, we ought to have that testimony. If there is nothing of the sort, then the Department ought to furnish us this information. They have so far refused it not only to the Senate, but to the country.

Mr. HAWLEY. What document does the Senator refer to?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I refer to the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has a copy of it in his hand.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have one of the committee's copies, but there is another pamphlet—I do not know what it contains—of hearings before the committee on this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. That pertains to the canteen business, I suppose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know. Does it pertain to anything else?

Mr. BURROWS. I will state to the Senator that the testimony taken before the committee was published in two volumes, one relating to the general question of the Army and the other relating to the canteen question; and those two documents have been published, and the Senator has them before him.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have one of them. I have the one with regard to the Army bill. These are, both alike, printed for the use of the committee, not for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. There is another pamphlet containing the testimony in relation to the canteen.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And that has never been printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. A joint resolution was introduced to print 15,000 copies of that document, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

While I have the floor, I wish to say to the Senator, in answer to his statement that he has no information as to the necessity for increasing the Army to 54,000, that that information is embraced in the report of the Secretary of War and the report of the Adjutant-General sent to the Senate, and can be gotten in the document room.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is also contained in the message of the President.

Mr. BURROWS. And also in the message of the President, giving in detail the necessity for the proposed increase.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it seems to me the Committee on Military Affairs ought to furnish us some information on this subject in their report. There are only two lines in their report regarding it. There are several pages in the report showing why intoxicating liquors should be sold in the canteen to the Army, and that is all there is to the report. This other information does not come to us. I suppose the report is the unanimous report of the committee, because the minority have made no report, so far as I can ascertain, and seem to have no objection to the report of the majority.

I should like to know where we can get this information. I have introduced a resolution calling on the War Department for information, but the resolution has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and not reported back. I do not see how we can go on with a bill of this vast importance, affecting the future of the country for generations and overturning our entire policy as a people, without this information. I think we are entitled to have it, and that the committee should give the information to us.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has had before him the message of the President of the United States and the reports of all the various branches of the Government in detail, together with the hearings before the committee. He has also had a pamphlet giving the numbers of the force in detail, and I do not think anything further could be given unless the committee should attempt to make an eloquent oration on the subject. All the facts are here.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I will suggest in relation to this matter that Senate joint resolution 146, for the printing as a Senate document of so much of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs as relates to the post exchange or canteen be recalled. It was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Printing. It directed the printing of 15,000 copies under the supposition that it required the action of both Houses, but an estimate has been made of the cost of the printing of the hearings, and it is found that it comes within the rule of the Senate, being $495. I ask that that joint resolution may be recalled and a Senate resolution passed authorizing the printing. There is no reason why the document can not be printed by the order of the Senate at once. I will offer the resolution I hold in my hand as a substitute for the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the proposition of the Senator?

Mr. BURROWS. There was a joint resolution introduced to authorize the printing of 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Military Committee on the post exchange or canteen. It is found upon examination that, in order to have the printing done, a joint resolution is not required, as the amount of the cost of the printing comes within the rule of the Senate, and the document can be printed simply by authority of the Senate. I ask for the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution named by him, ordering the printing of 15,000 copies of the document referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I rise to inquire what the document is which is referred to in the resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. The document relates to the canteen—the portion of the testimony taken before the committee relating exclusively to that subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I thought that the hearings before the Military Committee were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. I have in my hand—I have not been able to get a copy printed for the use of the Senate—one of the committee reports of the hearings, but that does not contain the information relating to the canteen. Why is it that this information is in two separate documents? Why is it that it is now proposed to print simply the information in regard to the canteen for the use of the Senate, and as to the other information it is simply proposed to print the hearings for the use of the committee?

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to the Senator that there was considerable demand for that portion of the testimony which related to the Army canteen. The demand was so great that it was thought best to have that portion of the testimony printed separately; and it was supposed that of the testimony relating to the general bill there would not be required such a large print. Therefore that resolution was offered separately.

I simply ask now to have the number of 15,000 copies of the hearings relating to the canteen authorized to be printed by the Senate. It comes within the rules.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator think that the public is only interested in the canteen portion of this bill—that that is the most important feature—and that the public is not much concerned about the other important question, the raising of a large standing army of 100,000 for all time?

Mr. BURROWS. I will state to the Senate and to the Senator that that was the reason given why they should be printed separately. It was thought a greater number of that portion would be required than of the general report.

So far as I am individually concerned—and I presume the committee has no objection—I do not object to the other testimony being printed, to any number that may be wanted. I will amend the resolution, if the Senator desires, to make it 15,000 copies of the regular report of the testimony and hearings on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. The thing which interests me is to know why it is thought that only the canteen portion of the hearings would be interesting to the public. The Senator said "it was thought that that was the only portion of the hearings that would be interesting to the public." It is quite interesting to know why it was so thought, and who thought it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator's trouble arises from the fact that the resolution was to print a large number, and it was supposed to require a joint resolution. If the printing to be ordered costs above $500, under the law it must be provided for in a joint resolution; but after the joint resolution had been sent to the Committee on Printing the Printing Office made its estimate, and it was found that the printing would come within the $500 limit. So the reference of the joint resolution should be reconsidered and a simple resolution of the Senate adopted on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the point at all. Here is a concurrent resolution offered which we are informed would require both Houses to concur on account of the cost; but the resolution does not include the most important part of the hearings.

The Senator from Michigan said "it was thought" there would be no desire to have the information that was put before the committee as to the most important features of the bill. He thought and said "it was thought" by somebody that the public would not be interested in the other part of the hearings. The canteen part of it does not amount to the snap of my finger in comparison with the remainder of the bill.

The Senator says "it was thought" there was no interest in the hearings before the committee on anything but the canteen. Of course, if we must have a joint resolution to go before both Houses for the printing of that you might have had a large book containing all of the hearings printed instead of a partial report of a few pages. I want to know why "it was thought" that the public would not be interested in anything but the canteen provision in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. A resolution to print a thousand copies of the entire report, outside of the canteen hearings, was passed on Friday, and the report has been printed.

Mr. BUTLER. I say, if that is so, the copies are not for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has a copy of it now.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a copy, too, of a part of the hearings before the committee, but it is printed for the use of the committee only.

Mr. ALDRICH. The copies are here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the copies have just been brought in.

Mr. BUTLER. But they have not been printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; they have been.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Secretary please send me a copy?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am advised that the information which the Senator seeks has been printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Was it printed as a Senate document?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator is wrong. I have not been able to get a copy. Will the Secretary send me a copy of all the hearings which have been printed for the use of the Senate?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what detained it. It ought to be in the document room or in the possession of Senators.

Mr. ALLISON. We can, I think, dispose of this matter in a very brief space of time. As I understand, the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from South Dakota want all these documents for the use of the Senate in order to inform Senators of the details of this measure. The first part of the document has been already printed and is in the document room. I sent to the document room and got a copy of it.

As to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan for printing the hearings on the canteen question, I suggest that the Senator ask to have printed also a thousand copies of that document, and later on we can furnish the information suggested by the Senator from North Carolina to the people at large who may want to read all this testimony. That will enable us to go on with our work now without delaying the whole subject in order that we may furnish information to the country respecting the testimony. I think that would meet the approval of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the statement made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that the cost of printing 15,000 copies of the evidence relating to the canteen would be $495. If there was an addition of the other, it would evidently increase the cost beyond the $500, and would require a joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore my suggestion, in view of what the Senator from Michigan stated, is that we print a thousand copies of the hearings on the canteen question—and I think a thousand will be enough for us to ascertain the situation on that subject—and then, later on, the committee can propose an addition of fifteen or twenty thousand copies of the whole testimony in the form of a joint resolution. I think that ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina. If the Senator can get a thousand copies, or his portion of a thousand copies, it will enable us to go on with the debate on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. What I object to is having the testimony on the canteen question first printed, which is insignificant compared to the important features of the bill, and then to having the remainder of the hearings printed in a separate document with only a small number for distribution. It should all be in one document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. There has been no unanimous consent to receive the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have not objected to the resolution. Therefore I have not objected to the unanimous consent. What I object to is to having a part of the testimony printed in one document and the remainder printed in a separate document. The resolution before us proposes to leave out of the widely circulated document the most important part of the testimony. Here is a proposition to have printed 15,000 copies of an unimportant part of the testimony. Why should not the important part of the testimony be included in it?

What is the purpose of having the matter separated? Because a few sentimentalists, who have worthy intentions and whose motives are good and in the interest of temperance and good order and discipline in the Army, so desire, is it the purpose to have the testimony separated, so that one part can be sent to those people and the remainder of the information before the committee, which every patriotic citizen should see, can be kept from them? If there are some good people in this country who think the canteen the only important question, then they need enlightenment; for the fact is that there are other questions more important in this bill, or at least equally important with that. Now, why should the testimony which would give them all the information not be printed in one document?

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. I simply want to answer the Senator's question as to why these matters are to be printed separately. I can say, from my own individual experience, that I have had hundreds of letters daily on the canteen question from large numbers of good people in New Jersey and elsewhere—good men and women who are members of the great temperance organizations of this country.

It was not necessary to send them the documents containing all of the testimony in relation to the increase of the army in the Philippines and everything else connected with the subject, and so the matters have been printed separately. Those people were not particularly interested in the increase of the Army, and so we ordered a number of documents containing the testimony in relation to the canteen, so that they might be sent to those good people as an answer to their letters. That is the reason why the matter has been printed separately.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no information to me in what the Senator says, for I knew all that before. His so-called information confirms me that I am right.

Mr. SEWELL. Then the Senator does not desire to be informed.

Mr. LODGE. What is before the Senate, Mr. President?

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that his remark is entirely gratuitous, because——

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. Just a moment. I will not be taken off of my feet at this point. I have had the same kind of requests which the Senator from New Jersey says that he has had. I have had ten requests for the hearings on the canteen question where I have had one request for the other hearings. It is simply because I want those persons—10 to 1, or 16 to 1, if you please—to get all the information on the subject instead of only a part of it.

I do not want to take the time to write to each one of them long letters to call their attention to the important features of the bill outside of the canteen provision. When they ask for a part of the information before the committee, I want them to get it all; and it is for the information of my own constituents, as well as for those of the Senator from New Jersey and the remainder of the country, that I desire to have all the information printed together.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator desires to do that, he has all of it printed to-day, and he can send both documents in the same envelope.

Mr. BUTLER. I have so far only the committee hearings printed for the use of the committee, and not as a Senate document. I ask that the resolution be amended so that the two documents may be printed together. Does the Senator object to that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has asked unanimous consent to present at this time a resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Michigan to withdraw the resolution. It is very evident that it will lead to prolonged discussion.

Mr. BURROWS. I certainly shall do that, unless it will be agreeable to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to have the resolution modified in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and have a thousand copies of each of the documents printed for the use of the Senate. That will bring it within the rule of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I object to—having the committee hearings printed separately. I want every person to see all of the hearings. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. BURROWS. Then I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that all I ask is to have the information printed together, so that a person can get it all in one book or document.

Mr. BURROWS. I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, what is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment to the Army reorganization bill, presented by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. On page 27 of the bill, beginning at line 11, and striking out the successive paragraphs of section 20 down to and including line 16, on page 28; that is to say, striking out the whole provision made by the House of Representatives for a veterinary corps and substituting the Senate proposition, which begins in line 17, on page 28. The question now is on accepting the report of the committee striking out section 20.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is detained from the Senate by reason of a funeral. He notified me this morning that he would be back at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and requested me to ask the Senate to pass over that amendment until he shall have returned. While I am myself prepared to submit some remarks on the proposition, I should very much prefer to wait until the return of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LODGE. Why should we not go on? There is a good deal to be said on the subject, and I think we might as well utilize the intervening time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I again call attention to the fact that the question is on striking out section 20, beginning on page 27 and running down to line 16 on page 28. That strikes out the House proposition for a veterinary corps.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the suggestion on behalf of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], unless this is the last amendment to be considered by the committee, I would suggest that this had better go over.

Mr. KENNEY. Do I understand from the chairman of the committee that I can proceed with my remarks on the consideration of that Senate amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall be very glad if the Senator will do so.

Mr. KENNEY. I am prepared to go on if it is the wish of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the peculiar situation in which the veterinary-corps amendment is placed by the action of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. It is well known to every member of the Senate that the Committee on Military Affairs, in May of last year, refused to report favorably an amendment that I sent to that committee, establishing a veterinary corps. When the bill for the reorganization of the Army was before the Senate, I moved the adoption of that amendment. It was agreed to by the Senate, and went to the other House. There it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The adjournment in June following shortly afterwards, there was no action taken in that committee until just before this session, and when the Committee on Military Affairs of the House had acted upon that bill, striking out all of the Senate bill which was passed in May of last year, the veterinary corps was left out; but upon the motion of the distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, the amendment that had been placed upon the bill by the Senate was agreed to in the House in every particular, in every word and sentence.

The bill as amended by the other House came to the Senate, when, contrary to my understanding of parliamentary usage, it was referred again to the Committee on Military Affairs, and was not taken up for consideration by a committee of conference.

When we examine the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on the Army bill we find the veterinary corps, as agreed to by the amendment of the Senate and agreed to by the other House, stricken out, and a provision inserted which is claimed, by those who are opposed to the proposition submitted by myself in the Senate amendment of last May, to be sufficient and satisfactory.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Committee on Military Affairs covering that proposition and to invite their attention to the statement—no doubt not intentionally made by the committee, but nevertheless it is misleading—which I read from the report:

> An amendment not reported by the committee—

This follows the report of the committee dealing with the action of the House on the Senate bill, leaving the impression upon the mind of any Senator who might examine this report that it was the action of the House and not of the Senate. The report reads as follows:

> An amendment not reported by the committee last session was inserted in Senate bill 4300 providing for a formidable veterinary corps.

Mr. President, the committee says the provision was inserted in the House, when, in point of fact, it was inserted in the Senate on my motion to agree to the amendment establishing that corps.

The report continues:

> The Senate committee proposes to strike out the section providing for such a corps, which was inserted in the House, and insert in lieu therefor section 16, which in the judgment of cavalry officers and quartermasters grants to the Army a sufficient number of veterinarians with sufficient rank and pay.

Mr. President, I have twice since I have had the honor to occupy a seat in the Senate spoken in advocacy of the establishment of a proper veterinary corps in the Army of the United States. In doing this I have been largely governed by that which obtains in the armies of the great European powers. What is proposed by this amendment, or what was ingrafted into the Senate bill by the action of the other House after the Committee on Military Affairs had refused to act favorably upon the Senate amendment, is very much less than is the veterinary establishment in any of the great European armies.

It has been contended by some Senators and by officers of the Army that the cavalry officers were better judges of the condition of the cavalry horses than veterinarians. I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the horse doctor of twenty years ago is not the veterinarian of to-day. As I have said in this Chamber before, veterinarians in every State of this Union to-day are graduates of colleges and sons of gentlemen. They are fitted to be associated with officers of the Army in commission, whether they be of the line or of the staff.

The cost of this proposition, giving it into the hands of a commissioned class of officers, would not exceed, except by a few thousand dollars, that which is paid to-day for what are called the contract veterinarians. The contract veterinarian has no authority. He to-day does not exercise the same authority in military affairs that a troop sergeant or a corporal would exercise. He has no rank and no authority.

What we desire is an organized corps, with a responsible head, under the Secretary of War, of veterinarians as commissioned officers, but only to be made such after a fit and proper examination under conditions to be regulated by the Secretary of War. There is not to-day, as I understand from those who are in a position to know, in the Army of the United States a veterinarian competent to pass as an inspector of meats.

It is well understood, in fact it has been demonstrated by our experience during the last war this country had, which was with Spain, and our troubles in the Philippines, that much of the food that is issued to the Army of the United States is issued in bulk; and there are not, as I understand, in that Army to-day men competent to pass upon the condition of that food. It is well known that in all the great packing establishments of the United States there are veterinarians appointed by the Bureau of Animal Industry to look after the condition of meat therein packed. And yet those who oppose the service of veterinarians in the Army of the United States are willing that the meat food given to the soldiers of our Army shall go without inspection.

When Senators who are opposed to the establishment of this corps contend that the provisions made by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs when they came to consider the House bill are ample for all purposes from a veterinarian standpoint, they must be ignorant of the fact that section 16, which is the substitute or amendment for the veterinary section of the Senate bill as approved by the House, is in no wise a measure that would improve the present condition of the veterinary corps or the veterinarians of the Army of the United States. Under it they would simply be contract veterinarians or surgeons, without authority, subject to the control and the domination of every enlisted man, if you please, in the Army. No authority would they have whatever. No matter what might be their view of this or that condition of the army horses and mules, they could not by any means in the world, under present conditions or the conditions that are to be imposed by the Senate amendment, exercise any control.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been lost to this Government by the failure to have a properly organized veterinarian corps. Horses have been condemned and sold hundreds and hundreds of times for prices that were simply nominal. They were condemned, but not by veterinarian surgeons; not by men who understood the condition or the diseases of these horses, but simply condemned by the Army officer who found for the time being that a horse or a mule was incapacitated for military duty. They were passed on, and when they came into the stable of some great cab company by the expenditure of a few dollars they were made as good as they were when they were first purchased by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army.

I contend, that if this corps be organized as proposed, and as it has been indorsed by the Senate and the House, there will be saved to the Government, in the care and proper treatment of diseased horses of the Army, not of the cavalry alone, but of the artillery as well as of the Quartermaster's Department, more money than would be necessary to pay for this service.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Veterinary Journal, printed in Sheffield, England, in which the question of veterinary medicine is treated in connection with the present war which England is waging in South Africa; and I desire that the paragraphs herein marked shall be printed in connection with the remarks I am now delivering.

The waste in horseflesh during the South African campaign has been little short of appalling, and for that waste the inadequacy of the army veterinary department has been largely to blame. Not that the members of that department are responsible for its failure. With the material at their disposal they have done what they could; where they failed, failure was inevitable and could easily have been foretold.

Even were their qualifications all that could be wished, they would have acquired little experience in civil life to deal with the everyday contingencies of a campaign.

In the English army, Mr. President, the proportion of veterinarians to the number of troops is 136 to 17,586; in this country, under the provisions of this amendment, the proportion would be 36 to 34,000; in Austria-Hungary there are 180 veterinarians to 47,380 troops; in Belgium, 35 veterinarians to 6,064; in France, 603 veterinarians to 80,000; in Prussia, 501 to 53,270; in Spain, 236 veterinarians to 14,376. So in the scheme now under consideration the proportion of veterinary surgeons to the troops will be less than that of any of the well-regulated armies of the European nations.

This is not a scheme by which any man may be given a commission, but I look at it from an economical standpoint, involving a proposition by which this Government, under such an organization, will save many, many thousands of dollars by the proper care of army animals, thereby saving them to the Army instead of having them condemned when the disease or trouble is simply temporary.

Not only that, but there is the question of meat inspection, which to my mind is most important, and there is no class of men so able and fitted to treat it. In fact, there are none except properly graduated veterinary surgeons. It is undoubtedly known to every Senator here that in the great universities of this country there have been established within the last few years veterinarian schools which rank very high, and among the students of those schools and post-graduates of those schools there are gentlemen who stand among the first class in this country. It is absurd to say that a veterinary surgeon should not be given the same rank and consideration that are given to the graduate of a medical school. They are gentlemen just as well.

If there be a question as to which should be given the greater consideration, then to my mind he who studies that he may be enabled to relieve the suffering of a dumb animal should have the first place, not the second place, with him who studies that he may treat the diseases of mankind. In the one case the patient is able to explain and tell where his pains and troubles are located. In the other case it is a matter of diagnosis, and the physician of the horse, necessarily, if he be successful, must be superior to the other doctor. There is the difference, Mr. President, and I think if the first place should be given either of those great professions, it should be given to the veterinary surgeon. There is no man who has a higher appreciation of the medical profession than I, but I desire to call your attention, Mr. President, and the attention of the Senate to the differences between those two classes of medical men.

Mr. President, we are advised through the press that the War Department is opposed to the establishment of this corps. In an article which I read this morning there is a letter sent by the Secretary of War, Mr. Root, to the Military Affairs Committee, and I desire that the letter may be incorporated in my remarks.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 5, 1901.

SIR: I send you herewith a copy of a letter just received by me from the secretary of the New York State Veterinary Medical Society, commending the position taken by this Department in regard to the proposal to create a veterinary corps in the Army.

Let me also recall to your attention the paper which I left with your committee some time since, signed by a number of the chief veterinarians now in the service, taking substantially the same position. Let me restate the position, in order that there may be no misunderstanding. This Department is not opposed to suitable recognition of veterinarians.

It has no serious objection to giving them military rank, although I do not think it is a wise course to give military rank to civilian employees. What I do object to is the creation of a new corps, with a colonel at the head, reporting directly to the Secretary of War, and thus necessarily creating a new bureau in the War Department, and a body of officers who, communicating directly with the Secretary of War through their chief, are necessarily independent of the commanding officers of the cavalry regiments and the horse artillery organizations. One of the recognized defects of our present Army organization is that of multiple command and division of duties and responsibilities between the officers commanding troops and territorial departments on the one hand and staff officers responsible to a head in Washington on the other.

The result is that it is impossible to fix responsibility for any failure to remedy defects or abuses. The proposed organization of a veterinary corps is but another step in the wrong direction, and will increase the evils which ought to be remedied. The general officer in command of troops ought to be able to hold the officers of the cavalry and artillery regiments responsible for having their organizations ready for active and efficient duty at all times. If the horses of these organizations are under the charge of a veterinary corps, with the chief reporting directly to the Secretary of War, there can be no such responsibility.

Give the veterinarians rank if you deem it wise; but I most earnestly urge that you do not impose upon us another bureau of the War Department, another independent corps, another element of disintegration, divided responsibility, and consequent inefficiency.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

There is in not a single line or sentence of that letter an argument against the incorporation into the military department of this Government of a veterinary corps. The only suggestion, not an argument, which the Secretary of War makes in this connection is that it would create a separate and distinct bureau—somebody else to report to the Secretary of War. If the good results which I predict will follow the establishment of a veterinary corps in the Army of the United States, and it is opposed only on the ground that it will create a separate and distinct corps in the War Department of this Government, then I say that there should be no question about its establishment. If there be reason why some corps of the Army to-day should be abolished, there being too many corps, there must be argument to show that those corps ought to be abolished. We come here asking that a corps be established, a new corps, a departure in the military system of this Government, that can not mean anything else than a betterment of the service and a great saving of money to the Department.

What is there in the argument that there are to-day too many corps in the War Department? If that contention can be sustained, we contend that this ought to be established.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not mean to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KENNEY. I am glad to have the interruption of the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose no one contends that there should not be competent veterinarians connected with the cavalry. The bill provides for that. It also provides, does it not, for the employment of an adequate number of responsible veterinarians in the Quartermaster's Department? The difference of opinion is upon the question whether there should be a distinct veterinary staff corps. Does not the Senator think there should be a dental staff corps? If not, why not?

Mr. KENNEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not the Senator think there should be a staff corps of these very able and skillful men who make a specialty of that work?

Mr. KENNEY. I will answer, and say I do not think so. I think there is all the difference in the world between a dentist for the Army and a veterinary surgeon, and if the Senator desires I will explain why I think there is a difference.

Mr. SPOONER. It is part of the duties of veterinarians to look after teeth of horses?

Mr. KENNEY. Undoubtedly, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. And it is the business of the dentist to look after the teeth of the men?

Mr. KENNEY. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a specialty, not a part of the practice of the regular physician. This bill provides for an adequate number of dentists, which is certainly very important. Why should there not be a staff of dentists? I will also inquire of the Senator why there should not be a staff corps of chiropodists?

Mr. KENNEY. I have lived long enough to recall a time when I did not know a dentist in that part of the country in which I was reared, and when the people's teeth were treated by surgeons and doctors.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will agree that that is not the fact now.

Mr. KENNEY. No, sir; it is not. I admit that.

Mr. SPOONER. A great many of these regiments are to-day on the frontier isolated, and a good many of these regiments are, and undoubtedly are to be, in the Philippines.

Mr. KENNEY. I assume that none of the regiments that are on the frontier or in the Philippines will be without a surgeon——

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, but a dental surgeon!

Mr. KENNEY. Who, I contend, is able to treat the teeth of a soldier in case of emergency; but the veterinarians not only treat the teeth or mouths of horses, but they treat every disease to which those animals are subject. They treat the teeth, if need be; they treat the glanders and all other diseases that may attack army animals, whether they be mules, horses, or oxen. I do not believe the dentists to whom the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has called my attention would attempt to take a post at some isolated garrison or with some regiment in outlying territory, in the Philippines, and treat men for yellow fever or malarial fever or any of those diseases that have proven so fatal to our troops in the field; but the veterinarian is able to treat all diseases of the horse as well as he is able to treat the teeth of the horse.

Mr. President, I do not remember to have had my attention called to a proposition to be considered by the Congress of the United States that has met with such unanimous approval as has the establishment of a veterinarian corps in the Army of the United States. I understand that the men who form the veterinary association of the United States, made up of that class of gentlemen of whom I have spoken, have for many years been clamoring at the doors of Congress, asking that they be given that rank and consideration to which their profession entitles them. Year after year they have failed, and for three Congresses I have stood here and championed their cause. We succeeded in May of last year in ingrafting upon the then military bill a provision for the establishment of this corps. It went to the House, as I stated at the beginning of my remarks, and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and was there stricken out.

When it came before the House of Representatives in the present session, after full and complete debate, the House reinserted the amendment of the Senate bill. But notwithstanding that in both Houses of Congress the proposition has been indorsed, the Military Committee of the Senate has seen fit to strike it out under the most extraordinary circumstances of legislation that I have ever known, and we are here to-day asking not that this amendment may be again adopted, but only asking the Senate to stand by its record of last May.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand Pearson's Magazine, of the edition of June, 1900, in which there is an article written by V. D'O. Noble, of the Twenty-seventh English Regiment. There are certain paragraphs in it which I will not detain the Senate by reading, but I will ask that they may be inserted in my remarks. I think they are most pertinent.

At Waterloo military veterinary surgeons first came into public recognition and rendered valuable work when the carnage was over, being instrumental in saving the lives of many animals which otherwise would have been dispatched by pistol bullets. They were attached to the ambulance corps, which in those days was in a very primitive stage, and, save for a few knives and drugs, were totally unprovided with instruments possessed by the modern veterinary surgeon. Furthermore, they were not allowed anywhere near the fighting line, and had Wellington been defeated undoubtedly would have left the field without succoring a single animal.

After Waterloo the war office (which had hitherto acted purely on Wellington's suggestion in sending veterinaries to the front) resolved to pay greater attention to this branch of the army, and thus was the foundation laid of the great establishment now known as the army veterinary department.

* * * * * * *

Rank is of no less importance in the veterinary department of the British army at the front than in the royal army medical corps, and the principal veterinary officer in South Africa is on the staff of Lord Roberts and advises him upon all points connected with the animals in his charge. It is his duty to attend to all the veterinary arrangements of the army on active service. Beneath him are the officers whose work it is to administer to the wounded and incapacitated animals, and they are distributed in the following proportion: Two officers to two batteries royal horse artillery, one cavalry brigade, and ammunition column. A mounted infantry battalion with a machine gun is allowed three officers, and other mounted branches of the service are officered in proportion.

Besides this there are other establishments of equal importance, all of which have to be controlled by veterinary officers of tested ability. The staff at the base and on the line of communication is under the control of 8 veterinary officers; the sick-horse hospitals, whither all the wounded animals are sent, should have 3 officers, and the various remount depots 5 officers each.

Although the English veterinary department is fairly satisfactory, considering the difficulties cast in its way through no provision being made for the wounded horse in the Geneva convention, the veterinary system prevalent in the German army is distinctly better. Up to the Franco-German war of 1870 (in which something like 50,000 horses were slaughtered) the veterinary departments of continental powers were entirely in embryo; in fact, some armies lacked them altogether, such attention as the wounded horse required being given by the farriers. At the outbreak of the war, however, lovers of animals in all parts of the world rose up in arms to prevent the sufferings of dumb creatures on the battlefield, and were, to a certain extent, successful.

Germany's veterinary department, which for years before had been growing in importance, was recognized, and a more perfect system of treatment for wounded horses was instituted, which proved of the greatest utility during the war. Veterinary hospitals were formed on the line of communication, as is being done by the British army in South Africa, and injured animals, instead of being slaughtered wholesale, were treated scientifically.

France, on the other hand, made little amendment in her system, and the sufferings of wounded animals were terrible to contemplate. True, they were collected and attended to, but not before they had been lying incapable on the battlefield very often for days together.

At the conclusion of the war the veterinary department was entirely reorganized, and when France embarks on her next campaign the wounded horses will be treated with as much care as are those of either the British or German armies.

The English Government to-day has on hand a war in South Africa which I understand from my reading demands a greater number of army animals in order to prosecute it than possibly any other war in the history of the world, and this officer of the English regiment calls attention to the deficiency of the English veterinary corps, a corps which I have shown by the figures I have quoted is well established—old—established for years. Yet in the war in South Africa against the patriotic Boers it has proven inadequate, there not being enough of them in order to save to the British Government, as it should, the loss and destruction of army animals.

Our war with Spain was of too short duration to tax to any great extent our military system. Had that war been prolonged, as it might have been and as we had good reason to suppose when it began that it would be, I would not be the only man standing on the floor of the Senate advocating the establishment of a veterinary corps, but we would have had the solid indorsement of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate in favor of this proposition, because that experience would have taught the people of this country and the Congress that a well-organized and well-governed veterinary corps is necessary to a perfect and complete military establishment in the United States.

Mr. President, while I had expected to submit at another time some remarks on the general proposition involved in this bill, I feel that it would not be out of order to present those ideas during my discussion of the veterinary amendment, if it may be so called. I am one of those Senators who stand ready and willing to vote for any army the President of the United States may say he needs for the purposes of present conditions. But I am not willing to place in the hands of the President of the United States, whether it be this President or some other President, the power to increase or diminish the Army of the United States at his pleasure. If a hundred thousand men are needed to maintain the flag of our country in the Philippine Islands or upon any other territory that has been acquired by this country, whether by conquest, purchase, or treaty, then I will vote for that army, but not without limit.

We understand what is asked for in this bill; what is necessary under the advices given us by the President; and yet I would limit that Army to three years, and in doing so I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that would be the term of enlistment, and if, after the expiration of three years, it was found necessary to continue the Army, there would be few men occupying seats in this Chamber or in the other who would fail to respond to the demands of our Government and the necessity that might be upon us at that time. It is much easier to create a great standing army than it is to get rid of it. Let us limit its establishment by time, so that it will not take legislation to reduce it, but so that when the time expires the Army may march home, where the men will go back again into the counting house and the store and the field. Let us not be called upon to pass laws to abolish the Army. On the other hand, as I have said, if it should be necessary to continue that Army, then the Congress of the United States may be relied upon to continue it, and just for so long a time as may be necessary to maintain the dignity and honor of this great Republic of ours.

Mr. President, I do have misgivings as to the purposes for which this Army is to be created. I do doubt, and most seriously so, if there ever will be a time, whether you have 100,000 or 500,000 men, when you will have overcome that spirit of patriotism now dominant in those islands of the Philippines. I do not have any sympathy with those who contend that by mere force of arms we should go and wipe those people from the face of the earth. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who said the other day that it was a question as to how long it would be before the male population of those islands will be wiped from the territory upon which they live, and how long it will take to get rid of the wives and daughters of the men who have gone before them. If those people are imbued with that spirit of patriotism which possessed our fathers in '76, then I say to you that there can not be raised within the borders of this great Republic of ours enough soldiers to subdue them and bring them as absolute serfs under the control of a people who are ignorant of their customs and ignorant of their language.

Mr. President, why can not this great Government rise to this emergency and say to those people, "Lay down your arms; no more war will we wage against you; we appreciate your struggle for liberty, that sort of a struggle which gave free America to us; we will be the guiding hand and will put you on the highway to a higher civilization and a greater freedom than even to-day, if it be possible, is known among our own people?" How grand and glorious it would be for the American people to stop the butchering and bloodshed in those islands! They are not the worshipers of idols. They have seen centuries of civilization, and all during those years, going back to the time when the first Spanish ship dropped its anchor in those harbors, those men have struggled to be free; and when they saw the most glorious banner that ever floated at the masthead of any ship or went in the front of a battalion landed upon their shores, they hailed it, regarding it as a token of that freedom for which they had struggled and for which their fathers had died.

Mr. President, the American people can afford to take that position. They ought to take it. What returns are we getting for the bloodshed that we are causing those islands? Are there riches flowing from those islands that shut the eyes of the American people to this great crime? I think not. When we are asked by the authorities of this Government, those in control of it, to increase our Army in order that we may maintain the army in the Philippines according to its present strength, I think it is an absolute confession that there is such a struggle on the part of those patriotic men that it is doubtful in the minds of the authorities whether or not it can be quelled.

Mr. President, if the spark of patriotism burns in the bosoms of those men as I think it does they never can be subdued. There are two ways in which this matter should be treated. One of those ways is this: With a sufficient force, and without a gun loaded, we should go into those islands; we should abolish our commission, and say to them "You know what sort of a government you need here; we will see that that sort of a government, in the interests of all the people, in order that justice may be done, shall be established and maintained." We should be there on guard, if you please, and never should the hammer of a rifle be drawn back to fire a bullet at those men.

Do you not believe that if we were to adopt that policy the war in the Philippines would end? Do you not believe if we said to them we were there simply as a guiding hand to put them in a better condition than they are to-day or ever have been they would welcome us? If we said to them, "We are not here to put you in thraldom; we are not here to shackle your ankles and your wrists; we are not here to make you a dependent people upon a great and powerful nation, but we are here to guide and help you, that you may be strong yourselves, and until that day comes we will stand by and the strong arm of the American Republic will ever be at your beck and call," do you think there would be any war after such a declaration by the people of this country? Mr. President, there has not been a single Senator, no matter upon which side of this Chamber he sits, who has contended that ever within the history of the world the Philippine Islands can be incorporated as a State or Territory or as States or Territories into this Union. God forbid the day when we should see sitting in this Chamber one of those Asiatics in the seat of a Senator of the United States.

The arguments used in regard to the Louisiana purchase and Florida and the Mexican possessions or even Alaska go for naught in this discussion. The conditions in the one case can not be compared for a moment with the conditions in the Philippines. There is a great nation of 10,000,000 people occupying a territory so small that it may be said that the population of those islands is dense. Those people are not roaming bands of savages with a few detached villages or settlements of white men, like the case in Louisiana, Florida, the Mexican concessions, and Alaska.

We are rising up, Mr. President, to-day and making ourselves to all the world known and understood to be a people who have started on a career of imperialism. Was there ever in the history of Rome, and you have read Froude on that subject; a case where imperialism was more in force than is the case to-day in the Philippines? What have those people to do with their government? We are told that they are in rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. President, I understand that there is certain territory within the Philippine Islands in which the American authority is complete, and yet we have not been advised that the inhabitants of those places over which the authority of the United States is unquestioned participate in the government that controls them. We are told by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], a soldier of distinction and renown and a member of the Military Committee, that the condition in the Philippines to-day, while it does not result in the great shocks of battle, yet has demonstrated that the loss of life under the conditions of the war in those islands to-day equals that which would be a war in which there were great shocks of battle.

From one end of those islands to the other there is a rebellion, you may call it, or a revolution, or revolt, against the American authority, and I contend that there has never been proof sufficient to the Senate nor to the people of the United States that the United States did ever have authority over those people. While I contend, and I so contended in some remarks that I delivered here, I think, in February, 1899, that the title of the United States was complete over those lands, yet I do contend that the title of the United States has never been complete over those people, and only within that prescribed territory where the arms of the United States are sufficiently strong to protect them against the attack and defeat of the Filipinos are the places where American authority to-day controls.

Mr. President, I read with the greatest pleasure this morning a reported——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a question?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the Senator from Delaware explain, if he can, the theory upon which he says the United States has complete title to the archipelago, but has not sovereignty over its inhabitants.

Mr. KENNEY. Over the people?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; sovereignty over its inhabitants. You say it has complete title to the archipelago.

Mr. KENNEY. I will answer that as best I understand it.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like the Senator to explain, if that be true, how it comes that the owner of the archipelago has not sovereignty over its inhabitants.

Mr. KENNEY. The title to the archipelago in Spain at the time of the ratification of the treaty of Paris did pass under that treaty to the United States of America; but I contend that no ratification of a treaty, that no grant of land, according to my idea of civil liberty, could give the control over human souls, and certainly not so long as those people repudiated any right on the part of Spain to even give to the United States by that treaty right and title to the land. I contend that that treaty did give to the United States absolute control over that territory; yet I hold, on the other hand, that no treaty made by any nation, no grant of territory made by any people or by any man, can transfer the souls of men to new masters.

Mr. President, this question of a great standing army has engaged the attention not only of statesmen, but it has engaged the attention of men of the church, and I found to-day in the Philadelphia Times of January 7, this morning's edition, a brief of a sermon delivered yesterday by the most distinguished churchman of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States, Cardinal Gibbons. I have not in all my reading or study of this great question seen so strong an argument against the establishment and maintenance of a great standing army as is contained in half a column, or thereabouts, of a brief of a sermon delivered by that distinguished churchman in Baltimore yesterday. I will not read it, but I desire that it may be incorporated in the remarks that I make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Delaware will be complied with. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

And how does our own country stand on the subject of war? Although the corner stone of the Constitution is peace with all nations and entangling alliances with none, we have had on our hands four wars in the century just brought to a close.

When we read of a great military campaign our imagination revels in the contemplation of the heroic achievements of famous generals. We listen with rapture to the clash of arms, the shouts of the victors, and the sound of martial music. We seem to catch the spirit of enthusiasm by which the combatants were animated.

But we take no notice of the shrieks and agonies of the soldiers weltering in their blood on the battlefield. We have no thought of the sick and wounded lying in hospitals and prisons. We are unmindful of sorrowing wives and mothers at home, weeping and sighing for the loved ones far away. We do not picture to ourselves the homes made desolate, the "Rachels bewailing their children and would not be comforted because they are not."

Is it not a mockery of justice and a scandal to the pagan world to see two Christian nations cutting each others' throats in the name of Christian civilization?

Is it not an outrage to contemplate one nation forcing by the sword her laws, her government, and political institutions on another nation in the interests of trade and commerce, as if merchandise and dollars and cents were of more value than human lives? Is it not monstrous to see a strong power invading a weak one, and seizing her territories on the hypocritical plea of rectifying her boundaries? This rectification of boundaries is a very old practice, and is a polite name for robbery on a large scale.

EUROPE A HUGE MILITARY CAMP.

It is a subject of great concern to the friends of the gospel of peace that Christian Europe presents to-day the spectacle of a huge military camp. All the nations of the Continent as well as England are armed to the teeth and are living in mutual dread and distrust of each other. They are devoured by an insatiable ambition of conquest and dominion or by fear of invasion. When you see heavy clouds surcharged with the electricity of war hanging over these nations, you may expect the thunderclap of battle to resound at any moment. Armed nations, like armed individuals, are a constant menace to one another and are easily provoked to fight.

And these military forces, instead of diminishing, are unhappily increasing every year. As soon as one nation augments its armament its neighbor feels impelled to do likewise in self-protection.

When we consider the immense number of men that are torn from the bosom of their families in the prime of life, that are withdrawn from active industrial pursuits; when we see these young men vegetating in idleness in time of peace, and luxuriating in license and dissipation in time of war, we may form some idea of the moral, material, and social evils resulting from such a system. In contemplating the standing armies the calm observers might be forced to conclude that European governments were primarily established to destroy, rather than to save life, to foster happiness, and develop the resources of a country.

LET US NOT IMITATE FOREIGN POWERS.

May God so guide our legislators and statesmen that they may never be betrayed into imitating European governments by the establishment of formidable standing armies. God forbid that we ourselves, flushed with recent victories, should ever become intoxicated with the wine of imperialism or militarism, but may we always follow the traditions of the fathers of the Republic.

Hitherto we have presented to the world a beautiful spectacle. Europeans, accustomed at home to meet a soldier or gendarme at every street corner, on arriving in this country have been filled with surprise and admiration that a nation of so vast an extent and with such an immense population contains an army of only 25,000 men.

They have been forcibly impressed with the fact that they can travel from Maine to California without meeting a single soldier. They see that every citizen of the United States is a soldier without uniform, engaged in the active pursuits of life, and ready at a moment's notice to defend his country. They would feel that we are a strong nation because we cheerfully bow to the majesty of the law, and are not confronted and intimidated by military satraps. May this fair picture never be defaced.

God grant that the new century which has just dawned upon us may inaugurate a new era of peace, fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Mr. KENNEY. When the Administration Senators (and I understand that is a term which may be used when we want to distinguish the Senators on the other side of this Chamber) come to this side of the Chamber and say 100,000 men are needed in order to maintain the dignity and honor of the American flag all over the world, and when they are willing to say to us that three years is enough to subdue the revolution in the Philippines, that three years is enough time to end the troubles in Cuba, that three years is enough time when Porto Rico will be so pacified that it will not take a single American rifle in that island, then I am one of those whose votes will go to give to the American Republic an Army of 100,000 men. And if I were to be here three years thereafter and it should be demonstrated that it was necessary to continue that Army or to have an Army of 75,000 men for another three years, my vote would be cast in favor of such an establishment.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will allow me, I offer an amendment in the way of a new section to the pending Army bill, which I ask may be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. VEST.

Add the following:

"The officers in charge of Westpoint Military Academy shall make and enforce such rules and regulations as will prevent the practice of hazing, and any cadet found guilty of participating in such practice shall be expelled from the Academy, and shall not be reappointed to the corps of cadets therein."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. KENNEY. I ask that the veterinary corps matter may go over until 3 o'clock, when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will arrive. I do not propose to limit the debate; the debate can go on; but I ask that no final action be taken until after the hour I have named.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the request. After I have spoken on the subject, if no other gentleman here present wishes to speak, we will not press it to a vote.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to offer an amendment now?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to insert after the last part of section 29 what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert after section 29 the following:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to select from the brigadier-generals of volunteers two volunteer officers, without regard to age, and appoint them brigadier-generals, United States Army, for the purpose of placing them on the retired list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I do not mean to go into the general question, but will confine myself at the present time simply to the proposition to establish a veterinary corps.

The veterinarian of the Army has grown up from men employed at posts originally; the old farrier of the troop has become a veterinarian. But the real veterinarians, the men who educate themselves under the Government, commencing at West Point, are the officers of the cavalry and the light batteries. The man who is the veterinarian of the troop par excellence is the captain of that troop. The man who has spent twenty years in the service attaining that rank, most of his study being devoted to the horse; the officer who every morning at stable call goes down and examines every horse from its head to its fetlocks and applies whatever is necessary to cure him of any disease that he may have, is the veterinarian that we have to depend upon.

Gentlemen who, like the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], will draw on the stories of others in relation to the veterinary service do not know from practical personal experience what the situation is as to the control and care of a horse in the service. However, they may make very fine speeches on the subject, and all that.

The horse is an animal that costs $125. He is a great friend of man. Nowhere is he better taken care of than in a troop of cavalry, because the officer who controls that troop knows that his life is at stake at all times, and that his horse may save him or his men.

This is a proposition to inject into the Army a new corps, commencing with colonel. As I have said, the accomplished veterinarian of the Army, who has made a study of the horse all his life, takes twenty years to be a captain, but the officer who is to have charge of this veterinary corps comes into the service with the rank of a colonel. The others are lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, first lieutenants, men who have practically never ridden a horse, who never have stood the shock of battle, who do not know anything about a horse except what they have learned at a college. I believe the class of veterinarians is improving all the time, because the class of horses in private life is improving. It does not apply to the Army a particle.

Here it is proposed that we shall have 1 colonel, an assistant chief, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a major, to be promoted in 1905; 4 veterinarians, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain of cavalry; 10 assistant veterinarians, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a first lieutenant of cavalry, and so on. The colonel of this corps must reside in the city of Washington. He reports to the Secretary of War. The officers of it are to be scattered all over the country. The major goes to a post of two companies. Where there is a second lieutenant in command, he takes charge. A man who has never had any experience with men or horses so far as they are applied to war absolutely takes control of officers who have been in the service for years, managing their own commands under the authority of their post commander and their regimental commander.

Mr. President, anything that interferes with the right of a captain, a major in command of a post, the colonel of a battalion or regiment, the senior officer of a light battery, to say what horses shall go out on a given day, inflicts a serious attack on the Army of the United States. We have seen in times gone by, and probably will not see as much of it again, when an isolated Army post has been notified by a scout that a raid of Comanches was approaching them, when every horse was needed. That would be a nice time for a veterinary surgeon to say, "I have reported to the Secretary of War through the chief of this corps that this horse can not leave here today, or that horse, or a dozen horses." The lives of the men are at stake; the honor of the Army is at stake. The officer in command, if the horse is able to go at all, orders him and rides him to death, if necessary, and he has the approval of the whole Army in doing so.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question for information. Did I understand him to say that the highest rank a veterinary surgeon in the Army can attain now is captain?

Mr. SEWELL. No; he can not attain that. He has no rank now.

Mr. VEST. Can he not be a lieutenant?

Mr. SEWELL. He gets the pay of a second lieutenant.

Mr. VEST. Without the rank?

Mr. SEWELL. Without the rank. He is a contract veterinarian, the same as a contract surgeon.

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon for interrupting the Senator. I did not understand it.

Mr. KENNEY. Did I understand the distinguished Senator to say that a veterinarian is a second lieutenant? He has no rank.

Mr. SEWELL. He gets the pay of a second lieutenant.

Mr. KENNEY. And no rank.

Mr. SEWELL. He gets the pay and allowances, but no rank. That was agreed to only two years ago in the bill we then passed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But the committee now proposes to give him the rank of a second lieutenant, I understand.

Mr. SEWELL. No; they propose to give him the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, and they propose to increase the number 10 more. We have two classes, which were made two years ago, one getting the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant and the other, the old veterinarian, getting the pay and allowances of a sergeant-major. It is proposed in this bill, as a substitute for the bill that came from the House, to make them all of one class, with the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant.

But, Mr. President, I desire to impress upon the Senate the great injustice that is proposed to be done by injecting into the Army a new corps without any reason for it, without the Army desiring it, without the Secretary of War, the General Commanding, or anybody else practically desiring it. It was stated here two years ago, I think, by the Senator from Delaware, that several officers were very much in favor of it. Some officers said they were in favor of veterinarians; as a matter of course, they were all in favor of veterinarians, but they were not in favor of a veterinary corps.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator just one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's speech, but in reply to what the distinguished Senator has just said I desire to call his attention to the opinions which have been given by Major-General Merritt, General Brooke, General Wilson, General Wheeler, Colonel Hein, General Randolph, Brig. Gen. Charles King, and Colonel Pullman, Quartermaster's Department; and inasmuch as I have been called upon to reply to the Senator's statement that no officers have approved of the proposition, I shall ask that these opinions may be incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to it, Mr. President.

The paper referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

I am very much interested in this veterinary matter, and you have my best wishes for success. June 26, 1900.

MAJ. GEN. WESLEY MERRITT (RETIRED).

* * * I am heartily in favor of the organization of a veterinary corps for the United States Army. The need of a properly organized corps has long been recognized, especially by officers whose service has been with mounted troops. The cost of such a corps would be small compared with the increase in the efficiency of the animals of the mounted and transportation services and the value of what it would save to the Government. To make such a corps properly effective, the veterinarians composing it should, of course, have commissioned rank. * * *

MAJ. GEN. JOHN R. BROOKE.

* * * I have always favored more scientific care of our Army transportation as well as cavalry mounts, and believe it would be to the interest of the Government to establish a veterinary corps on the lines set out by you. All efforts heretofore set forth in this direction seem to have failed, but the results of the last war and the large, possibly unnecessary, loss of animals for want of proper care would seem to make this a proper time to bring the matter up for the consideration of Congress. I assure you I am heartily in sympathy with your project and would be glad to see it successful. * * *

MAJ. GEN. J. H. WILSON.

* * * There is no branch of the service so neglected as that of veterinary science and attention to the animals used in connection with the Army.

I heartily join in giving my commendation to the measure which is proposed in reference to the organization of a permanent veterinary corps as a part of the war establishment of the United States. Every encouragement should be given to this branch of the service. The officers should be duly commissioned, have promotion in their own corps, and be paid as high salaries as the corresponding grades in the Medical Department. They should, of course, be rigidly examined, not only for admission into the service, but for each promotion which might be made in their own corps. * * *

BRIG. GEN. JOSEPH WHEELER.

* * * For many years while in Congress I urged improvement of the veterinary service of the United States. An efficient cavalry force can not be maintained without an efficient veterinary service. * * *

COL. O. L. HEIN, COMMANDANT OF CADETS, WESTPOINT.

* * * I am heartily in accord with the views expressed * * * on the necessity of a proper veterinary corps in our Army and your proposed organization of the same. * * *

BRIG. GEN. WALLACE F. RANDOLPH, COLONEL FIRST ARTILLERY.

* * * It would be a great saving to the Government. * * *

BRIG. GEN. CHARLES KING.

* * * Until we have such a corps as you contemplate our mounted forces will continue to be seriously handicapped in the future as they have been in the past. I wish you every success. * * *

COL. JOHN W. PULLMAN, QUARTERMASTER, UNITED STATES ARMY.

* * * I consider an army organization seriously incomplete without an efficient veterinary corps. Modern European armies have them, why shond not the United States? We are modern and progressive and leading in all military matters, skill, and competency. Why should we be behind in this?

Our veterinary corps to be efficient should be complete, and it can not be complete unless it is independent. Therefore it should be a separate corps—like the Medical Corps, the Quartermaster's Corps, and the other separate and independent staff corps—necessary for a complete working military establishment.

* * * The separate and independent organization is necessary to enable its chief to intelligently and effectively direct individual assignment of members of his corps to positions, stations, and duties fitting the special skill, experience, and reputation of each member, and permitting useful changes and transfers when necessity arises and the needs of the service and altering circumstances develop. In no other way and under no other system can this be advantageously accomplished.

I trust the bill you have outlined will be speedily passed into law. * * *

Mr. SEWELL. I will only say that the Senator was mistaken in thinking so. Here the Secretary of War says positively that General Merritt did not approve it, nor General Brooke either. I think that neither of them meant anything of the kind.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator please give me the reference to the page of the statement of the Secretary of War in the report?

Mr. SEWELL. It is in the hearings on the Army bill, page 90.

Mr. President, this question goes back of the Army and outside of the Army. It is a deliberate attempt, and I do not blame them for it, of the American Veterinary Medical Association to get commissions in the Army, to be recognized and to have a corps of their own. I ask the Secretary to read the marked paragraphs in relation to the meeting of the American Veterinary Medical Association held at Detroit, Mich., on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of September, in the year 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In order that we may make an intelligent campaign before the reconvening of Congress, our State secretaries, in conjunction with the officers of the State veterinary associations, will appoint committees and subcommittees for each State and Congressional district. You will be furnished with a list of Senators and Congressmen in your State, and you are begged to join with the committees in obtaining from them, when they have leisure at home, an interview to place the subject before them and secure from them renewed promise of support for our bill next December.

For any misunderstanding of the subject or argument in opposition we will send you at once the necessary facts in answer.

Here in Washington your Representatives are too busy to go into details and leave matters to committees. Obtain their interest while they have time at home.

In the coming election remember: An old Representative is worth five new ones if your friend, and is worse than ten new ones if against you. Experience teaches them how to legislate.

Interest the members of your State legislature and obtain their influence to secure a fair hearing from your Senators.

We demand an organized veterinary corps as provided for in S. 4300 when this bill passes, or as a part of the first Army bill which does pass in its place when Congress reconvenes.

Any compromise, simply of rank, without reorganization, will not increase the efficiency of the Army, and will set back the proper recognition of the profession a quarter of a century.

This is a question of merit, economy, and necessity for the efficiency of the Army, and is not a political one, as the following names of some of our supporters show:

Senators: ALLISON, FRYE, GALLINGER, HALE, WOLCOTT, BACON, CLAY, KENNEY, MCENERY, and MORGAN.

Congressmen: CAPRON, HULL, JOY, MERCER, TAWNEY, ALLEN (Mississippi), CLAYTON (New York), GAINES, LENTZ, and SULZER.

Mr. SEWELL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Before the Senator proceeds, will he pardon me if I ask him a question?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I feel as the Senator does about the creation of this staff corps of veterinarians, but I wish to ask the Senator what objection there is to giving to the requisite number of veterinarians the rank, so that if a man serves twenty years or more as a veterinarian he may retire on the pay of a first or second lieutenant?

Mr. SEWELL. I will answer that. The veterinarians are emerging from what may be called the obscurity of their standing in the Army, and from the fact that we have already given one class of them the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, and are likely to do the same with the others, we are gradually getting to give them commissions of the lower grade. We have not reported it yet, but it will gradually grow in that direction. There is no recommendation from the War Department to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. I notice that in this hearing, on page 91, Senator PROCTOR put the following question to the Secretary of War:

It is getting to be treated more and more as a profession, and they have colleges, one quite prominent one in Canada; and so I ask, in view of the fact that the House has passed this outrageous provision—as I think it is—though I do not suppose there is any substantial difference in the committee—would it not be well, Mr. Secretary, in this bill, to have an alternative proposition—there is nothing in your bill about them—say, giving them a rank of first or second lieutenants, second lieutenants for the time, and then first lieutenants? I ask for information.

To that the Secretary of War responded:

I think that is very reasonable.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that in the letter of the Secretary of War dated January 3, 1901, and just now laid upon our desks, he concludes by making a similar statement?

Mr. SPOONER. The objection of the Secretary of War is not to giving them rank.

Mr. FORAKER. No; he says give the veterinarians rank if you deem it wise, but he opposes the establishment of a separate corps.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state that he never recommended it, and the Military Committee have got to get their recommendations largely from the War Department. They come from the officers of the Army, from the different forces, and from the War Department. We take from the Department, from the recommendation of the Secretary of War, our cue as to the governing elements of the Department. I should like to have read the remarks of the Secretary of War on page 90 of the hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I think we are ready to go to something else.

Secretary ROOT. We pass to the veterinary corps. You will remember after you reported the bill at the last session the clause providing for a veterinary corps, with a colonel at its head, was put in on the floor of the Senate. The same thing has been put in by the House and in the same way. The House committee was opposed to it, as you were opposed to it, and it was put in on the floor of the House. It was put in on statements made, unquestionably in entire good faith, to the effect that there was a general agreement by military authorities in favor of it. The statement was made on the floor of the House that the President was in favor of it. The President and his Secretary of War certainly are not at issue on that question. He is not in favor of it. The statement was made that General Miles was in favor of it. The statement was a mistake; he is not; I have here a written statement to that effect. The statement was made that the Quartermaster-General, General Ludington, who has charge of purchase of horses for the Army, was in favor of it. The statement was a mistake; he is not. I have his written authority to that effect. The statement was made that General Merritt was in favor of it.

General Merritt made a statement, and it appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last session, that he is in favor of a veterinary corps, but totally opposed to the creation of a new bureau in the War Department, and that is what this creates. The provision is for a colonel, 4 majors, 10 captains, 10 first lieutenants, and 20 second lieutenants. The colonel is to report directly to the Secretary of War. Now, take the full force and the strength of that. What does it mean? Where is the office of this colonel to be? He is to report to the Secretary of War. That means he is to be in the War Department. And you have got another bureau of the War Department. The officers of the corps will be under the direction of a colonel, just as the officers of the Engineer Corps are under the direction of the Chief of Engineers.

The colonel of cavalry, who, when he is ordered out, ought to be held responsible for having not only his men but his horses fit for duty, is relieved from that responsibility because the Secretary of War is charged with it, through this new bureau of the War Department—through this chief of the veterinary corps. And I protest against it as being the reversal of all the principles of sound administration and an increase of the evil that now oppresses the American Army, which is an excess of multiple command—too many bureaus and too much staff control. I do not object to having competent veterinarians, I do not object to their having rank which will enable them to take places in the headquarters and be treated on a different basis from the enlisted man; but I submit that the officer who has charge of the horses of a regiment should be under the command of the colonel of the regiment, and not an independent officer, receiving constant instructions and communications from the Secretary of War through the head of the bureau, which will be superior to the control and the directions and the discipline of the colonel of the regiment.

Senator COCKRELL. Suppose the colonel of cavalry was ordered to make a certain movement, to take with him a certain number of men. His veterinarian examines the horses, we will say, and finds a certain number unfit for duty, and his commands prohibit those horses from being used. What would the colonel do?

Secretary ROOT. I do not know; he could not do anything.

Senator PROCTOR (addressing Senator COCKRELL). You would shut the veterinarian up in the guardhouse; that is what you would do.

Senator COCKRELL. Suppose the veterinarian says the horses are unfit to be ridden, and the colonel then orders them out anyway and the veterinarian stops them, there would be a little collision. We all know what would be the result if there was a good colonel in command. But suppose those men are commissioned and the veterinarian in a regiment has equal authority with the colonel of cavalry, then it would be a difficult matter to settle.

Secretary ROOT. I do not know any principle so important in administration as that responsibility shall be fixed. It does not make much difference how you change leaders if you can fix the responsibility on somebody—hold somebody responsible. You will then get along. But just as soon as you begin to divide up responsibility, so that you shift it off on to somebody else, you are gone.

Senator WARREN. Is there any law under which these veterinarians of long service could be retired or in any way provided for in their old age?

Secretary ROOT. If you make them second lieutenants, they can be retired, of course.

Senator WARREN. I know of one who has been in thirty-eight or thirty-nine years as a veterinarian. When you provide for your examination and the raising of certain ones to the rank of second lieutenant, he may fail to pass, although he is looked upon, and I guess as a matter of fact he is, one of the most competent men in the Army in the West. But his book learning is not up to the point. There is a man who has spent his entire life in the service and he will receive no benefit by this proposed legislation. There is no way of providing for him?

Secretary ROOT. No; not that I know of. I believe there are six of them.

Senator COCKRELL. Is there no way of providing for these clerks that have been in the Departments all their lives?

Secretary ROOT. None; and it would be a rash committee that would report in favor of such a measure.

Senator PROCTOR. It is getting to be treated more and more as a profession, and they have colleges, one quite prominent one in Canada; and so I ask, in view of the fact that the House has passed this outrageous provision, as I think it is—though I do not suppose there is any substantial difference in the committee—would it not be well, Mr. Secretary, in this bill, to have an alternative proposition—there is nothing in your bill about them—say, giving them a rank of first or second lieutenants, second lieutenants for the time, and then first lieutenants? I ask for information.

Secretary ROOT. I think that is very reasonable.

Senator WARREN. It seems to me that the second man ought to be provided for. If a man is worth anything as a veterinarian, he is worth more than $75 per month.

Senator SEWELL. The chief man gets $125 per month now. There are two in each regiment. You might give him the pay and allowances of second lieutenant; that would allow him to retire.

Senator WARREN. Your second man has to be wholly in charge of certain horses; he has got to be a good veterinarian or else he is nothing at all, and I do not think $75 a month is enough for him.

Senator SEWELL. The captain of the troop must be a good horseman; he must know all about horses. He has taken twenty years to arrive at his rank, and when the troop is taken to an isolated position the captain has to see to it that every horse is in condition to be ridden, and it is not right that they should be under the control of anybody who can say "You can not take those horses." As a matter of fact, they have to be ridden to the death if necessary.

Secretary ROOT. Here is a proposition signed by four veterinarians of the first class, from the Fifth Cavalry, the Tenth Cavalry, the Seventh Cavalry, and the Sixth Cavalry. It is a letter to the Adjutant-General. I will read it——

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I do not desire that the reading shall be further continued.

I would say in relation to the question of rank for these officers, that I personally sympathize with them. I believe they ought to be encouraged after what has been done about educating them. I would not myself have any objection to making them second lieutenants, with the pay and allowances of second lieutenants of cavalry.

I desire, however, to present some other papers in this connection. I ask to have read the letter of Claude D. Morris, V. S., secretary of the New York State Veterinary Medical Society, which society does not take any part in this contention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. SEWELL. I will present the whole document, beginning with the letter of the Secretary of War, which contains the letter of Dr. Morris, and then letters from General Miles and General Ludington, all of which are contained in the Secretary's letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire the letter of the Secretary of War to be read?

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have the letter of the Secretary of War read, and also those I have mentioned contained in the same document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 3, 1901.

SIR: I send you herewith a copy of a letter just received by me from the secretary of the New York State Veterinary Medical Society, commending the position taken by this Department in regard to the proposal to create a veterinary corps in the Army.

Let me also recall to your attention the paper which I left with your committee some time since, signed by a number of the chief veterinarians now in the service, taking substantially the same position. Let me restate the position, in order that there may be no misunderstanding. This Department is not opposed to suitable recognition of veterinarians. It has no serious objection to giving them military rank, although I do not think it is a wise course to give military rank to civilian employees. What I do object to is the creation of a new corps with a colonel at the head, reporting directly to the Secretary of War, and thus necessarily creating a new bureau in the War Department, and a body of officers who, communicating directly with the Secretary of War through their chief, are necessarily independent of the commanding officers of the cavalry regiments and the horse artillery organizations. One of the recognized defects of our present Army organization is that of multiple command and division of duties and responsibilities between the officers commanding troops and territorial departments on the one hand and staff officers responsible to a head in Washington on the other.

The result is that it is impossible to fix responsibility for any failure to remedy defects or abuses. The proposed organization of a veterinary corps is but another step in the wrong direction, and will increase the evils which ought to be remedied. The general officer in command of troops ought to be able to hold the officers of the cavalry and artillery regiments responsible for having their organizations ready for active and efficient duty at all times. If the horses of these organizations are under the charge of a veterinary corps, with the chief reporting directly to the Secretary of War, there can be no such responsibility.

Give the veterinarians rank if you deem it wise, but I most earnestly urge that you do not impose upon us another bureau of the War Department, another independent corps, another element of disintegration, divided responsibility, and consequent inefficiency.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

NEW YORK STATE VETERINARY MEDICAL SOCIETY,
Binghamton, N. Y., December 31, 1900.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The position you take in relation to the veterinary-corps bill is quite in accord with the sentiments of many of the best veterinary practitioners in the country.

The profession at large is not at heart asking for the enactment of this measure. It is not clear to the minds of many the necessity for a veterinary bureau, while we all agree as recognizing the importance of a high-grade service for the cavalry. The profession all over the country has been urged by the gentlemen who are fathering the scheme to render every possible aid in the endeavor to obtain a favorable consideration by Congress, and no doubt much of the request in behalf of the bill from constituents to Senators and Representatives is in obedience to this solicitation.

Our society at its annual meeting September last did not consider this matter, although Dr. Huidekoper was present, and it is presumed he was there for the purpose of enlisting support, but learning there was some opposition no doubt considered that no indorsement from the society was safer than an average resolution.

I am not speaking for the society as against the bill, but simply to say that the State society is not on record in behalf of the bill. As a private practitioner I have written our Senator, Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, stating my objections to this measure.

With sincere consideration and esteem, I beg to be,

Very respectfully,

CLAUDE D. MORRIS, V. S.,
Secretary.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1900.

My views concerning the veterinary surgeons for the Army are shown by my letter to the Secretary of War dated February 22, 1896 (copy inclosed herewith), together with draft of bill suggested at that time (copy also inclosed).

Since that time we have had a large army scattered in two hemispheres, including a large number of public animals requiring the services of veterinarians. It is my opinion that an adequate number of skilled veterinary surgeons is necessary for the Army, but I have never recommended the creation of a separate corps or bureau and do not think such would be advisable, and I am of the opinion that whatever number of veterinary surgeons is authorized they should be subject to assignment to duty where they may be required, in a manner similar to that provided for officers of artillery in section 7 of Senate bill 4300 as it originally passed the Senate.

The question as to whether these veterinary surgeons should have the assimilated rank of second lieutenants, first lieutenants, captains, and, possibly, that of major I have always left for the consideration of the Department or Congress.

NELSON A. MILES,
Lieutenant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 8, 1900.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 7th instant relating to the establishment of a veterinary corps, in which you state that I was spoken of on the floor of the House, the other day, together with some other military authorities, as being in favor of the establishment of a veterinary corps for the Army, and, presumably upon the strength of these authorities, the House voted for a corps composed of a colonel, a major, 4 captains, 10 first lieutenants, and 20 second lieutenants, the chief of the corps to report direct to the Secretary of War, and asking whether I favored the establishment of such a corps.

In reply I have the honor to state that I have not expressed my views favoring the establishment of such a veterinary corps as indicated above, and therefore there is no warrant or authority for anyone to quote me as favoring such a measure, nor do I recommend such a corps.

Very respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General, U. S. A.

Mr. SEWELL. Now, Mr. President, I desire to have read the request of the veterinarians at present in the service, a short statement on page 92 of the hearings before the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Believing that the War Department is in favor of recommending legislation favorable to the Army veterinarians during the coming session of Congress, and knowing that our views on this subject have never been sought, we, the undersigned, first-class veterinarians of the United States Army, with years of experience in the service and being conversant with the conditions surrounding animal transportation and treatment from a military standpoint, respectfully submit our views solely with the object of being thoroughly understood in this connection.

First. We believe that the number of veterinarians to a regiment as now organized is ample, and that the light artillery should be provided with a proportionate number.

Second. We are not now, nor never have been, in sympathy with a movement by certain individuals who are at present endeavoring, through legislation, to establish a veterinary corps in the Army of the United States, knowing as we do that such a corps is unnecessary and superfluous.

Third. We respectfully request that the War Department recommend that the veterinarians of the first class now in the service, who have successfully passed the recent examinations, be appointed as first lieutenants of cavalry, previous service as veterinary surgeon and veterinarian in the Army to be allowed in computing pay and retirement.

That the veterinarians of the second class now in the service be appointed second lieutenants of cavalry, subject to examination, and that some provision be made for continuing in the service or retiring those with twenty years' service or over who fail to pass such examination, and that previous service be allowed those of the second class who pass the prescribed examination.

Fourth. That hereafter all appointments to vacancies be made after a competitive examination.

Respectfully submitted.

GERALD GRIFFIN,
Veterinarian First Class, Fifth Cavalry, Mayaguez, P. R.
C. D. MCMURDO,
Veterinarian First Class, Tenth Cavalry, Manzanillo, Cuba.
DANIEL LEMAY,
Veterinarian First Class, Seventh Cavalry, Habana, Cuba.
WILLIAM V. LUSK,
Veterinarian First Class, Second Cavalry, Matanzas, Cuba.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I have but very little more to say on this subject. I merely wish to endeavor to impress upon the Senate this one idea: That the discipline of the Army and the safety of the cavalry and artillery as represented by their live stock depends upon the troop and battery commanders. It does not depend on a veterinarian, and no veterinarians should be sent to a post hereafter if he holds a rank higher than that of the commanding officer. He ought not to be able to distribute the horses of that command as against the wishes and desires of the man who has to fight them.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY] spoke of the custom in the English army and of the large war they have now on hand.

Yes, Mr. President, they have had 100,000 horses and mules from this country alone, and they are here now buying 50,000 more. They brought them from Europe and they brought them from the East Indies, and and it is too bad that the veterinarian corps of 108, or a regiment, or whatever it is, should allow all these horses to die off in such a short period. The horse that has gone to South Africa up to this time has lived but six weeks after he was landed. The fact is that the English have a large veterinary corps, but the officers of the English army—and I think this remark will apply to the French; not so much to the Germans, possibly, because there is too much discipline there—never do anything at the stables, whilst our officers do. Their education and their daily labor is to look as much after the horses as after the men, and consequently in the service of European armies, like the English, it is left to the veterinary corps, and the result is 100,000 horses and mules were killed in one campaign.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words upon this proposed amendment. I do not think that anyone doubts or is disposed to question the immense importance of the veterinarian to the modern army, nor do I think anyone is disposed to question that there has been an enormous advance in veterinary science of late years, and that the work of the men engaged in the care of horses has changed from a very rude to a very scientific practice. I must say I think everyone, so far as I am aware, is anxious to do everything that is proper for the veterinarians of the Army, to give them suitable rank and suitable pay; but, Mr. President, what is proposed here is something very different from that. It is proposed by the House amendment to make a great corps of the veterinarians; to take some man, some doctor, out of civil life or who has never been in the service more than six months, perhaps, in the Spanish war, bring him down here to Washington, put him in a bureau in the War Department, cover him with gold lace, and make him a colonel of the Regular Army over the heads of men who have served this country all their lives long.

There is no justice in that, Mr. President; there is no justice to the veterinarians, and there is bitter injustice to the men who are in the line and have given their entire lives to the service.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts upon what authority he says that this bill proposes to bring some man out of private life, make him a colonel of this corps, and cover him with gold lace?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, the proposition leaves the door open for that. We all know what is behind this bill.

Mr. KENNEY. I want to know if the Senator would suppose that the President of the United States would go outside of those veterinarians who to-day have made themselves distinguished in the Army of the United States, appoint some man from civil life, and cover him with gold lace instead of appointing one of those men who have shown their ability to perform the duty?

Mr. LODGE. I did not yield to the Senator to discuss what the President of the United States would do. The point is that this can be done. A man can be taken from civil life who never served in the Army at all; a man can be taken who perhaps has seen six months' service in the Spanish war, or you can take a veterinarian from the Army or anywhere you please and put him at the head of this proposed corps. The door is open to do just that—to take some man, place him here at Washington, give him a lot of rank and gold lace, and also authority over men who have served in the Army for years. We wish to do justice to the veterinarians. We desire to give them, I think, proper rank and proper pay; but in doing that we do not want to do an injustice to other men.

The most vicious part of this scheme is the proposition to establish a new corps. I can not add anything on that point to what has been said by the Secretary of War in the admirable letter which has just been placed upon our desks. The whole thing is there.

We are making a great struggle in this Army bill to get an improved organization of the Army, to get rid of some of the dispersion and confusion and disorganization which now exist under our present system and to replace it with concentration and better organization. This is a proposition to add to the existing evils which we all feel are in the present organization. It is to make another corps, another bureau, and more dispersion, when our object ought to be concentration and simplicity.

If I should talk for an hour I could not put it better than it is put in the single sentence with which the Secretary of War closes his letter. He says:

> Give the veterinarians rank if you deem it wise, but I most earnestly urge that you do not impose upon us another bureau of the War Department, another independent corps, another element of disintegration, divided responsibility, and consequent inefficiency.

We know from the letter to which that is a reply that the veterinarians of the country are by no means united on this matter. They have been skillfully organized; they have been skillfully instructed where to write and how to move. There never has been a better managed campaign than the one that has been made in behalf of this measure. Letters have been poured in on us from all sources. But the veterinarians of the Army—and now it appears many of the veterinarians outside—see the absurdity of building up this new corps. Do them justice, give them rank, give them proper pay, give them all that belongs to men of scientific training and proper education, but do not put them in a position where they are going to enter into immediate conflict with the regular line of the Army, and cause confusion and lack of proper organization everywhere. It seems to me that it is a bad principle.

Mr. President, I desire to say something which goes a little farther than the question of this veterinary corps with regard to the bad principle which I think this proposition illustrates. I am not going to discuss the question of standing armies. I do not believe there is anybody in his sober mind who imagines for a moment that the liberties of this country are going to be destroyed by a hundred thousand men. I do not believe there is any intelligent, sober-minded man who thinks that the American citizen who loves his country, and who is ready to die for her one minute, becomes an easy tool of tyranny the moment he puts on that country's uniform. I do not believe that anybody really thinks in his heart that the American Republic is in danger if we have an Army of 100,000 men here. This was all very well as one of the humors of the campaign, but it is not worth while to consider it seriously here. The American people are against large standing armies. But a hundred thousand men is a very small one for a nation of 70,000,000 people—too small, if they need more; too large, if they need less.

The whole principle of our people is against standing armies, and there is no danger that we shall ever go back on that principle. There is no danger that we shall ever build up an army voluntarily in Congress, which appropriates money for its support every year, in order to overthrow the liberties of the country. I think we may neglect that part of the question.

Nor, Mr. President, do I mean to enter at any length into a discussion of the Philippine question. That is a vast subject, which we discussed here at the last session by and large, up and down, for days and days, with great elaboration. I do not think there is any need of traveling over that ground again, and if I desired to do so, I could not find anything to add to the terse, admirable, and vigorous statement which was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] the other day.

We all know really what the condition there is. We know that organized resistance is ended; that the local "George Washington" is in hiding; that his cabinet is mostly in prison. There is a great deal of disorder throughout the Philippine Islands, and there is a great deal more than usual owing to the fact that there has been a war there. I believe myself—and I have a great many letters from those islands, owing to my being chairman of the Committee on the Philippines—that those troubles are declining, and that they will die out. That it will take a good while for them to do so I have no question, but that affairs are tending that way now I am equally without question.

Now, Mr. President, such being the situation, the question of what shall be done in the Philippines is one for the best judgment of the military authorities, of the President, and of Congress, and the Military Committee has formed its opinion on the best information it can get. That it is going to take us some time to deal with the disorders in the Philippines I have already said, and if Senators will take the trouble to read the history of the Philippines they will find that there have been outbreaks and troubles among those people during the past three centuries, ranging from great uprisings and massacres by the Chinese, and of the Chinese, down to the chronic war which Spain carried on with the Mohammedans, the Moros of the southern islands. There has been periodic fighting in those islands, disorders among savage tribes, fighting of the Moros, troubles—sometimes of great magnitude and sometimes slight—from the time of the Spanish settlement. There has been just the same result there that there is everwhere where you bring a high civilization—an outside civilization—into contact with people more or less civilized or more or less savage. There is sure to be conflict.

It does not lie in our mouths to speak of it as such a horrible surprise. We have been fighting the Indians at short intervals ever since we landed here, nearly three hundred years ago. The fight has been going on steadily, and it only ended when our Eastern and Western frontiers came together and the Indians passed finally into the body of the population. So I say that the question in the Philippines is a practical one—one as to how many men are needed—and it is one for experts to decide. I am willing to trust men who have given it consideration, both in the Departments and in the Senate, the Secretary and the committee, the President and the men who understand it, and who are specially charged with this great responsibility.

What to me is infinitely more important than the number of men to be voted is that we should now make a good organization of our Army. Far more important than the number of men is it that we should make an army, which, whether it be 25,000 or 100,000, shall be the most perfect instrument of its kind in the world, and one which we can expand at any moment, whenever the hour of danger comes, into a great weapon of the highest efficiency. What we need is an army organization highly effective, perfectly composed, above all things elastic, and which can adapt itself to our system of calling on volunteers when danger comes to the country.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I do so for the purpose of getting the views of the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on the Philippines. I venture to ask the Senator whether or not I am to understand from what he has stated, in view of our experience in the Philippines (and considering the history of that people for the past three centuries) and our experience with the Indians, both of which have been stated by him, that it is the opinion of the Senator that we are to have a similar experience with the Philippines in the future; in other words, that for an indefinite time in the future, as the Filipinos have had with Spain and as we have had with the Indians, we are to have continuous war with those people?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do believe that we shall in a very short time, comparatively speaking, have peace and order throughout the great body of the Philippine Archipelago. I do not believe that under our Government, or their own government, or anybody else's government there will ever be a time, within reasonable range, when you can expect that there will never be outbreaks from men like the Moros of the southern islands or the totally wild tribes of the interior of the other islands. For instance—to explain what I mean—if we should take off our hands and take away our gunboats, I have not any doubt that the piracy of the Sulu seas would break out again at once.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean to have me understand, in reply to my inquiry, that, with the exception of piracy upon the Philippine seas, he thinks within any reasonable time there will be such peace in those islands as will not make a large standing army necessary?

Mr. LODGE. My judgment is that within a very short time—comparatively speaking, a very reasonable time—those islands will be in greater peace and order than they have ever known. If the Senator will allow me, I do not want to discuss the Philippine question. I expressly said so. I said only a few words about it. I should like to go on with what I do wish to say.

Mr. BACON. I did not ask the question with reference——

Mr. LODGE. I tried to answer the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I did not ask the question with reference to the Philippine problem, but with reference to its application to the question before us.

Mr. LODGE. I intended to answer the Senator to the best of my ability. I understood he wanted my opinion.

Mr. BACON. I wanted it for the purpose of drawing a conclusion as to whether or not a large standing army would be necessary for an indefinite time in order to maintain our authority there, or whether that necessity would, in the opinion of the Senator, within a very short time disappear.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator and I differ so hopelessly on the first terms that I do not think any answer I can make would be of use. He talks about a large standing army. I do not call 100,000 men a large standing army, if the necessities of the country require it. For a people of 80,000,000 it is a small standing army. I should be glad to see it 25,000 men. I do not believe in the principle of standing armies any more than the Senator does, but I do not call this a large one. This bill, as I understand, provides for 54,000.

Mr. BACON. Therefore, as I understand the Senator, independent of any needs in the Philippines, the Senator would be in favor of the present bill?

Mr. LODGE. Not in the least. I have said over and over again, and I am sorry I can not make the Senator understand——

Mr. BACON. It is, of course, my want of understanding.

Mr. LODGE. That if an army of 54,000—what this bill calls for—is too large, I want it reduced; if not large enough, I want it increased. I think all this talk about our liberties being endangered by 100,000 men—well, I can not say what I do think about it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for making a remark, and I will not interrupt him any more. The Senator has been selected by his party as chairman of the committee having particular charge of legislation in respect to the Philippine Islands. I have ventured to seek some light from the Senator, but as he is unwilling to give it, and attributes——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator to let me finish the sentence, and I will not again disturb him.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is on the floor by my courtesy.

Mr. BACON. I will not further trespass upon the Senator if he puts it on that ground.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator will allow me to say a word, that is all.

Mr. BACON. I shall not interrupt the Senator. He can proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. BACON. I have not interrupted him very frequently in the past, and I never have interrupted him with any result which was at all satisfactory. I am not in the habit of unduly interrupting Senators.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, I can easily understand that I have never been able to satisfy the Senator. I have never known anyone who could, and I pretend to no special talent. What I said was that I tried to answer his question. His question, as I understand it, was what my opinion was on a certain point. I have given that opinion. I am ready to give it again if the Senator desires. I do not care to go into the whole range of the Philippine question.

Mr. BACON. Well, as the Senator changes his aspect and invites it, I should like to have his opinion, the Senator being now in a frame of mind where he is willing to give it.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator kindly tell me just what he wants?

Mr. BACON. Yes; I will with pleasure, provided the Senator will permit me to do so——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. And not resent interference.

Mr. LODGE. I do not resent it in the least. I merely desire to learn what the Senator wants to know.

Mr. BACON. What I wish to know of the Senator is this: The Senator is chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, selected as such with a view to his presenting to this body matters relating to that subject. What I desire to know of the Senator in order that the Senate may determine whether or not an army of a hundred thousand men is needed, not only for a temporary time, but for an indefinite time, is whether, from the knowledge of the conditions which the Senator has stated he has with reference to affairs in the Philippine Islands, the prospect, in the opinion of the Senator, is such that the Army, now consisting of 76,000 men over there, as we are told by the Senator from New Jersey, will be needed there for a short time, or whether, in the opinion of the Senator, it is to be needed there for an indefinite time? Now, that is a very plain question, it seems to me.

Mr. SPOONER (to Mr. LODGE). What does he mean by a short time?

Mr. LODGE. What does the Senator call a short time?

Mr. BACON. Well, two years.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am now giving only my own opinion. Of course the Senator understands that I am not on the Committee on Military Affairs, and so far as the military side of the problem goes I have no special means of knowledge. My own opinion, from all the knowledge I have of the existing conditions there is, that in two years we shall be able to reduce the Army very largely. That is my belief. How many thousand men we can cut off I can not say. I believe we shall be able to reduce the Army. I believe at the end of a period twice as long we shall probably get the Army down to only that which is necessary to be kept there, whatever that may be, which I assume will not be a large force.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly what I want to know from the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator want to know my judgment on that point?

Mr. BACON. Indeed I do.

Mr. LODGE. Spain had 15,000 men in the archipelago and kept order very badly indeed.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and occupied comparatively small territory.

Mr. LODGE. And occupied comparatively little territory. I believe that in ordinary and normal times with 25,000 men—very possibly with 15,000—the number of the Spanish force, we could keep everything in a great deal better order and have the islands properly policed and have law and order and prosperity there as they never have been before.

Mr. BACON. Therefore, as I understand the Senator, the only increase of a permanent character necessary for this Army on account of the Philippine Islands will be from fifteen to twenty-five thousand men, and the other increase must be charged up to other needs than those of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that we now needed only fifteen to twenty-five thousand men.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not say that, either. I do not mean to be understood as representing the Senator as saying that; but within two years.

Mr. LODGE. Assuming that in normal times we need 20,000 men in the Philippines, that would leave, as I understand, 34,000 regulars, which I consider totally inadequate to take care of the fortifications of the United States, which I consider utterly inadequate to guard the canal that everybody wants to build. You have taken on yourselves the policing of the canal. You will begin, I hope, pretty soon to build it.

Mr. BACON. We will begin whenever your side of the Chamber says so.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. BACON. Pass the bill to-day.

Mr. LODGE. We will begin to build the canal very soon. You have to pour in there a great mass of labor gathered from every part of that tropical region.

There will be thirty or forty, perhaps fifty thousand laborers at work on that canal. You have to police it. When it is done, you have to guard it. You must have men for that. I merely mention that as one of the demands which will soon be made. I am not a military expert, but it seems to me that 34,000 men to take care of all that and of the fortifications and of Alaska and of posts all over this great country is a very small force.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I will not interrupt him further. The object of my inquiry was to ascertain from him, as chairman of the Philippine Committee, what, in his opinion, after, say, the space of two years from now, would be a requisite increase of the Army which would be required on account of the conditions in the Philippines; and I understand from the Senator—if I misrepresent him I do not wish to do so—that in his opinion after the space of two or three years 15,000 to 20,000 men will be sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think I quite said that. What I intended to say was this: Two years was named by the Senator, and I believe that within a short time, at the end of two years, we shall be able to reduce the present force very much. In four or five years I believe we shall be able to bring it down to fifteen or twenty thousand men.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has expressed the opinion that we may in a short time be able to reduce the army in the Philippines to fifteen or twenty thousand men. Is it not the Senator's opinion that we should be able to reduce the army to the minimum number he has named at a much earlier date if we could have the unanimous support for the Army bill and the other measures looking to the suppression of the insurrection in the Philippines?

Mr. LODGE. I entirely agree with that opinion. Every debate of this sort simply makes the time of the strife longer in the Philippines.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me one more question? If it be true that the necessity for this large Army is to be lessened in so short a time, would it not be more in accordance with the proper procedure that the Army should be increased for the temporary time during which, in the opinion of the Senator, this large force is going to be needed there, rather than to fasten upon the country for all time an army the necessity for which, according to his own statement, will not continue to exist in the same degree that it does now?

Mr. LODGE. That is the whole theory of the bill, as I understand it. It certainly is my theory. And if we need a hundred thousand men to do the work imposed on the United States at any given moment, we will have them. If, in the judgment of the President and Congress and the War Department, we do not need more than 25,000, we will have but 25,000.

Mr. President, what I wanted especially to speak about, and the point upon which I started, is the importance of having the Army rightly organized, to have it organized in such a way that it can expand easily if danger comes to the country, to make it, as I have already said, the best possible instrument, a framework which we can fill in rapidly with volunteers when the time comes.

Mr. President, anyone who has studied carefully the history of the Spanish war and events connected therewith knows perfectly well that all the troubles which befell us at that time in the way of transports, in the way of organization, all the things that led to the outcry here, were owing to defective organization. I never shared, I never had any sympathy with, the wolfish cry which went up to punish individuals for faults which were due to a system.

The system was bad. It was owing to us—to Congress—to the lack of interest in the newspapers, to the lack of interest among the people, that we had a bad system. It was not fair to pick out a man here and a man there and hold him up and crucify him before the American people and before the world because he could not suddenly transform a bad system into a good one. I do not mean to say that there were not plenty of men who fell short just as there were plenty of men who went beyond what we had a right to expect, but the trouble was in the system; and if we fail to remedy this system and war comes again and brings the same evils we shall have no one but ourselves to blame, and this time we shall do it with our eyes open. What before was a blunder, if it happens again will be little short of a crime.

We know where the troubles were. We know that we suddenly called on the departments here, filled with men who in many cases had been so far away from military life that they had become practically civilians again, to transport and to feed and to clothe and to set forth a great army of 225,000 men; and they broke down under it in a great many points. They broke down because the system was thoroughly bad, and if we continue that bad system it is our fault and not theirs, for it lies at our doors to remedy it.

Mr. President, there is a clause in this bill providing for the substitution of details instead of permanent bureaus, and it has been further amended by the Senator from Vermont, with the approval of the committee, so as to carry this reform up to the heads of the bureaus and to put the War Department organization of bureaus on the same footing as that of the Navy. It is one of the best things, in my judgment, that has been done for a long, long time. I had a great deal rather see Congress come together in extra session than to lose that provision in the bill.

My objection to the proposed veterinary corps is that it is in direct contradiction to this central principle, the whole object of which is to get rid of these permanent bureaus. You never can have a general staff, you never can get elasticity into your system, you never can have your officers in constant touch with the line—men who have gone back to it every three or four years and come in touch with the men they have to manage in time of war. You never can have these things, I say, unless you break down the system of permanent organization and put men in there as they are put in in the Navy—to serve their turn of duty and then go back to their men, returning again, if you like, to the particular work, but always in touch with the line of the Army.

Mr. President, I am no alarmist; I have no wars to predict; I do not believe we are in danger of war with anybody, and I do not believe there is a nation on the face of the earth which has any desire to attack us. But no man can tell what may happen at any time, and before I sit down I should like in a very few words to call the attention of the Senate, in connection with this matter, to the situation in which this country is to-day.

We have proceeded in the process of our development until we have expanded far beyond our own markets commercially, and we are breaking into every market in the world. It is a part of our economic development. We are marching fast toward the economic supremacy of the world. Mr. President, look at Europe and compare it with the United States—Europe, a small continent, thrust out like an outspread hand from the great Asian continent into the waters of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, made up of peninsulas, broken up into small states.

It has been worked over for a thousand years at least by men in the endeavor to draw out all its resources. It was a poor continent at best, compared to the others, and it has been worked for centuries. Now, look at ours. Here we are, holding all the best part of the North American continent, all in the temperate zone. Look at your map, a great symmetrical country, all under one flag, all under one roof, no separate governments, your railroads running in steady connections and carrying freight from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf. That means the greatest saving of cost in transportation imaginable. Europe can not meet it. It is impossible.

Every separate State system, every separate railroad that she has, enhances the cost of her articles. Her mines are old. Ours are but just opened. We are beating her in all the great products. We have beaten her already in iron and steel. We can turn them out at a price which Europe can not meet. We are going to surpass her in other articles. She will have to take her coal from us. It is a mere question of time when her last stronghold, the carrying trade, will be invaded. Already we can make steamship plates cheaper than she can make them. Only the other day I read in the newspapers that we had taken a contract in Glasgow for steel plates for commercial steamships against all competitors, and we underbid them £50,000 on that one contract. We have taken it, and there are to-day in Glasgow 14 furnaces, they say, damped down. What happens there will happen in the carrying trade. We shall build ships cheaper than they do. We shall in some way or another offset their subsidies to their steamships by our subsidies and put our ships on an even plane of competition. Thus we shall invade their last great stronghold.

Mr. President, before our eyes is a splendid picture of the industrial future of this country. I believe it is inevitable—that the great economic forces are all working that way. But does anyone suppose that the other people like it? They are gasping for breath in parts of Europe. They are struggling everywhere to get an opening for an overcrowded population, for an overproduction. That is why they have seized Africa. That is why they have seized the islands of the Pacific. China got into trouble, and in a moment the European nations thought that there would come a new division and that they could all get in there and find economic relief. It has been stopped. The Chinese Empire is going to be held together and its markets opened, I believe, to all the nations of the world; and I do not think I say anything improper or that I boast unduly when I say that it was owing to the United States that that policy was adopted instead of the other one. It is a great policy. We believe in it; we are all in sympathy with it; but do you suppose the other countries like it? I doubt it very much.

Anyone who has read the newspapers lately will have noticed that in the Vienna papers and elsewhere there has been continual talk about an economic federation to shut out the United States from Europe; and only the other day M. Leroy Beaulieu, who is one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest, of French economists, had a long article in one of the Vienna papers, urging a combination of Europe against us. In other words, they feel the economic pressure which we are putting upon them. They are feeling it more and more every day. They will try to meet us undoubtedly in the great field of economic rivalry. I believe that with our resources, with the character of our people, with our new country, with our great continent, the victory can only be with us, and that there can be but one end to that conflict of economic forces.

Mr. President, if anyone will take the trouble to look back into the history of modern times, since the great economic movements began, he will see how many of the wars came originally, never ostensibly but actually from economic causes. The league of Cambray was nothing in the world but the attempt of banded Europe to break down Venice, the center of exchanges and the greatest economic force of Europe at that time. There is no doubt in the world that Colbert, whose whole principle for the administration of Louis XIV was to keep the country at peace and build it up finally, found himself forced to make war on the Dutch because he felt that if they did not France would be economically ruined by the commercial supremacy of Holland and England; and those wars, which ostensibly were dynastic, followed one after the other. France failed, the economic pressure intensified, and the French Revolution arrived in due time.

Now, Mr. President, we occupy a great position economically. We are marching on to a still greater one. You may impede it, perhaps, by legislation; you may check it; but you can not stop the work of the economic forces. You can not stop the advance of the United States. We may blunder here in the legislation which we may pass for this thing or that thing, but the American people and the economic forces which underlie all are carrying us forward to the economic supremacy of the world. It is a great position, but, dazzled by its splendor, do not forget its perils. We look on at this great development, and we all take deep pride and pleasure in it, but it carries its dangers with it, and I want to see the United States always prepared to meet those dangers. We have no quarrel with any nation, and I hope we shall have none. I have said already that I see none who would wish to attack us; but I wish to see the United States so prepared that under these new conditions she will always be safe by sea and by land.

The control of the ocean is vital to us. That is why I have always advocated a Navy, and a powerful Navy, we must have. I wish to see our Army, whether it is ten thousand or twenty thousand or a hundred thousand strong, organized with the utmost skill and the utmost science, so that if the hour of peril ever does come we shall have a system which we can expand on the instant, one which will not immediately produce disaster and trouble, stumbling and hesitation, as it did at the beginning of the Spanish war. Make your Army large or small, as circumstances demand, but make your organization of that Army the best, the most flexible, the most elastic in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the discussion of the chief features of the bill under consideration and the wars of past ages by the junior Senator from Massachusetts have not entirely resulted in losing sight of the amendment that is really before the Senate, I should like to speak a few minutes touching that amendment.

It is a matter of regret to me that I was unavoidably kept from the Senate Chamber during the first two hours of the session to-day, and that I was from that circumstance denied the privilege of hearing the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], who is thoroughly acquainted with this subject, and also the first part of the speech of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

When this bill came before the Senate I called attention to the fact that in my opinion it presented an anomalous parliamentary situation, and I want to emphasize that matter in connection with this proposed amendment.

On the 4th day of May last, if I have the date correct, we passed a bill and sent it to the House of Representatives which contained a provision in reference to the establishment of a veterinary corps precisely as it stands in the bill to-day, without the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill went to the House of Representatives. The Military Committee of the other House, as the Military Committee of the Senate had done, advised against that amendment, but the House overruled the committee, precisely as the Senate had overruled its committee.

Now, Mr. President, both Houses of Congress have acted affirmatively on this proposition; both Houses of Congress have given their sanction to it, and yet by some legislative fiction the proposition is again before the Senate for discussion and for vote.

Mr. President, we have in our rules a provision that when a matter has once passed this body a motion to reconsider within two days shall be in order. There is a reason for that. The reason is that those who have taken part in that discussion and in that vote are supposed to be present, and they will have an opportunity again to record their votes on the question of reconsideration.

But in this case this body is asked to vote again upon a proposition that was affirmatively passed upon some eight months ago. I am not at all sure that a point of order would lie against the amendment. Indeed, I am pretty well persuaded that if a point of order should be made it would be overruled; but nevertheless I am firmly convinced that this is a vicious way of bringing a proposition before this body a second time, and that it may in the future come back to trouble us in the consideration of other important measures.

I say, then, Mr. President, that both Houses of Congress have acted affirmatively upon this proposition, and the provision that is in this bill as it came from the House of Representatives is word for word the provision that was put in it by the Senate on the 4th day of May last.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know how many Senators have changed their minds on this question. It is barely possible that the vote that resulted in incorporating that provision in the Army bill some eight months ago may be reversed by vote to-day, but, for one, I have not changed my mind in the least, and I am here to give my voice and vote in opposition to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senator from New Jersey laid great stress upon a letter from the Secretary of War, a letter that was laid upon my desk as I entered the Chamber, a letter that seems to have been ordered printed this very day, and undoubtedly it was marked "Rush," and it is back here to influence our votes on this bill.

Now, Mr. President, the opinion of the Secretary of War is well known and it is barely possible that in the debate last May the opinions of some of the high Army officers may have been misstated. I do not know how that may be. I do know that Army officers change their minds. I do know that the Adjutant-General of the Army not long ago wrote a letter in opposition to the Army canteen, and that he has now given testimony in favor of it; and it is just possible that some of these other Army officers have changed their minds in reference to this veterinary provision.

But what the Senator from New Jersey seemed to lay great stress upon was a letter from Dr. Claude D. Morris, a veterinarian living in Binghamton, N. Y., who seems to be the secretary of the New York State Veterinary Medical Society.

Now, Mr. President, if I am correctly informed, this secretary might be called an "accidental" secretary, and the representations he makes here are not the views of the society of which he is secretary. As I understand the matter, the New York Veterinary Medical Society has given its sanction to this bill by vote, and it was not necessary for that society to pass another series of resolutions indorsing it, as Dr. Morris seems to think ought to have been done. I say, Mr. President, that Claude D. Morris does not represent the New York State Veterinary Medical Society on this subject. As I entered the Senate Chamber, I was handed some telegrams. I do not know why they were sent to me, but they were sent to me, and I want to read two telegrams bearing on this very point. The first is dated Brooklyn, N. Y., January 7, 1901.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., January 7, 1901.

Senator GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Letter of C. D. Morris, secretary New York State Veterinary Medical Society, to Secretary Root, published in morning papers, stating society not in accord with amendment to Army bill creating veterinary corps, is without authority and absolutely false. Profession of State almost to a man has worked night and day for it and will be struck staggering blow if does not pass.

ROSCOE R. BELL,
President New York State Veterinary Medical Society, Editor American Veterinary Review.

The next telegram reads as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., January 7, 1901.

Senator GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The New York State Veterinary Medical Society is in favor of a veterinary corps in the Army reorganization bill. Secretary C. D. Morris individually is against it, but not the society.

WM. H. KELLY,
Chairman Legislative Committee New York State Veterinary Medical Society and State Secretary American Veterinary Medical Association.

Now, Mr. President, if I had been here and these telegrams had been on my desk when this document was ordered printed I would have asked that those telegrams might have been printed in conjunction with it, because it shows that while this one man has made haste to write a letter to the Secretary of War, which the Senate has made haste to print, to show that the New York State Veterinary Medical Society is opposed to this bill, the president of that society and the chairman of the legislative committee of that society, speaking for the society with more authority than a secretary could possibly speak, say that his statements are false and that the society is in favor of this measure.

I have three other telegrams which I desire to place in the RECORD. They are as follows:

WEST PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 7, 1901.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

All veterinarians in Pennsylvania and good veterinarians everywhere are in favor of the Army veterinary bill.

S. J. J. HARGER,
President State Veterinary Society, University of Pennsylvania.

WEST PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 7, 1901.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

The veterinary organizations and schools of the country all desire Army veterinary bill to become law.

W. HORACE HOSKINS,
Ex-President American Veterinary Association.

WEST PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 7, 1901.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

The veterinary profession, with 8,000 members, is solidly for the Army veterinary bill. Sincerely hope, for good of Army, it will pass to-day.

LEONARD PEARSON,
Pennsylvania State Veterinarian.

Now, Mr. President, I read these telegrams to show that this document that has been placed upon our desks and upon which so much stress has been laid is of no earthly consequence whatever. Claude D. Morris, secretary of the New York State Veterinary Medical Society, seems to speak for himself and for nobody else.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], when discussing this amendment, said that everybody is in favor of giving the veterinarians suitable rank and suitable pay. The Senator ought to have made an exception, and that exception ought to have been the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate of the United States, which has reported an amendment which does not give them any rank whatever.

It is true that during this debate since I entered the Senate Chamber some members of that committee have said that they are willing to yield this question of rank and give veterinarians rank of some kind. That reminds me of what a distinguished judge in my State once said. He was chief justice of the supreme court, and alluding to a certain matter, he said it was "late, reluctant, and unimportant." That is precisely the situation that the Committee on Military Affairs finds itself in to-day in reference to this matter. They have taken the ground that these men should not have rank. They have insisted upon that in season and out of season, and now they say that they are willing to give them rank, doubtless provided the rank suits the committee. We fought that battle here last May, and we succeeded in putting a provision in the bill which gave these men rank. Now they say to-day, Why, we are in favor of giving them rank of some kind; but notwithstanding that fact——

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg pardon; the committee did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some members of the committee. The Senator from Vermont says that the committee does not say that.

I stand corrected to that extent. Some members of that committee have said that during the discussion this afternoon.

Great stress is laid upon the fact that we have too many bureaus in the War Department already, and that this is adding another bureau to make further complication and further trouble in the administration of that great Department of the Government.

Well, Mr. President, I do not know much about this question in a technical sense; I am not a military man; but it does seem to me that the addition, not of a bureau, but of a corps, will not create very much trouble and will not be very apt to disrupt military matters or to make any very serious trouble in the administration of the War Department.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has offered an amendment that is going to remedy the troubles that already exist because of this multiplicity of bureaus. If that is so, why can not they remedy the difficulty that they claim will arise from this so-called bureau, which is not a bureau at all, in connection with the other bureaus of the War Department?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is no real substantial argument in the contention that giving these men some additional rank, giving them some additional pay, recognizing them as educated medical men, which they are at the present time, some of them, Mr. President, standing as high in the medical profession as any in this country, will result in any harm or will do more than justice to a deserving class of men who have given years and years of valuable time in preparing themselves for the discharge of their duty.

It will not do, Mr. President, to talk about these men as they have been talked about in the discussion of this question, perhaps not to-day but formerly, as horse doctors; it will not do to say that we are proposing to give rank and increased pay to a class of men who are mere horse doctors. It will not do in the year 1901 to talk that way about these men. The men who would receive these commissions are just as highly educated men as the men who are at the head of the Medical Department of our Army at the present time, and they are just as deserving, in my judgment, of recognition as are those men.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate, of course, will have another opportunity to pass upon this question, and it is possible that the Senate may reverse the action it took a few months ago, but for my part I esteem it a privilege to stand here and say a good word for these men and to cast my vote against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

I believe they are entirely deserving of the recognition they ask. I believe it will do no harm whatever to the Army, but, on the other hand, that it will result in much good to a very important branch of the Army, which needs as careful supervision as any other branch of the service.

The Senator from New Jersey talked about the destruction of the horses in South Africa, the fact that thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of them died shortly after they reached the African shores. But, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey of course did not mean to say that the death of those animals resulted from the fact that England has an educated veterinary corps; that England does give these men rank and recognition and proper pay. He surely did not mean to say that. Because we put the horses in our Army under a more competent corps of veterinarians, giving them proper rank, it can not be possible that disasters will come to the cavalry arm of our service in consequence of our doing that sensible thing.

Mr. President, I do not want to delay the consideration of this bill. I am very anxious that a vote should be taken upon it. For that reason I shall content myself with saying the few words I have said and of casting my vote against the proposed amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I wish Senators would consider the question, What is the need of this addition? Has there been any complaint that the animals in the Army are not properly cared for now under the present system?

The measure proposed by the committee extends that. It increases the pay. The system now pursued brings into the service scientific, educated men, all that are required, and at the present pay, and this measure gives them an increased pay. When veterinarians are needed notice is given that an examination will be held. One was held not very long ago. A skilled veterinarian from the Agricultural Department was a member of the examining board. Veterinarians—educated ones—from all parts of the country were examined and appointments were made. The Quartermaster-General testified that there was no difficulty in getting for every transport which went to the Philippines that carried animals skilled, educated veterinarians, and their pay was considerably less than that authorized by this measure.

Now, on the question of rank, one point against it is that there is no occasion for it. Another one is that there is endless confusion and trouble when rank is given to officers in the Army without command. I ask Senators to consider what might be the effect of the measure proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY]. The highest cavalry officer, the highest artillery officer, is a colonel. It is proposed to give the veterinarian the rank of colonel. Suppose he is located at our great cavalry post, Fort Riley. The highest officer in command there of the cavalry is a colonel. The cavalry officer is the commander of the post. There is a set of quarters, especially built for the commander, assigned to him. But if his commission is dated a little later than that of the veterinarian, if the veterinarian ranks him, he can say to him, "Colonel, I want your quarters," and there is no way under the sun but that the commander of the post must move out. So I say the matter of rank is not only not needed, but it would lead to great embarrassment. It is wrong in theory and wrong in practice to give rank without command.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEY. The distinguished Senator from Vermont has stated that the chief of this bureau would be a colonel, and it might be that he should be stationed at Fort Riley, and on that occasion, if his commission was dated a little prior to that of the cavalry officer commanding, he would take possession of the quarters assigned to the commander of that post. Why, Mr. President, there is no such proposition. All the rules and regulations that govern this corps are to be made by the Secretary of War, and if it is to be a corps of course the head of that corps would not be at Fort Riley, but he would be in the city of Washington, in the War Department. That is the only officer with the rank of colonel named in this entire provision. The next rank is that of major.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator has stated that it is the purpose of the provision to put the head of this proposed corps in Washington in the War Department. He has admitted the very greatest objection to the bill. The Department is now overloaded with bureaus. What we have been seeking to do was to reduce the influence of the staff corps somewhat. They are here and have the ear of Congress; and now it is proposed to create another which has shown in advance even of its creation that it has greater facility and power in the way of influencing legislation than any of the old ones which we have had to contend with for years. I think its very exhibition of power in that direction is reason enough for not having this legislation.

Mr. KENNEY. May I ask the Senator two questions? First, I will ask him whether there is a corps in the present Army that has not its headquarters in Washington? Second, I will ask him whether the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has abolished any corps of the Army, and whether, in point of fact, it has not increased them by creating a nurse corps?

Mr. PROCTOR. The proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs is not to abolish any corps directly, but it is to commence gradually at the foot of several corps the system of detail which when carried out fully (it could not be done at once without injustice to the men holding permanent appointments) will make all the officers of these several staff corps what they ought to be, line officers, what every officer in the German army is, and what General Sherman recommended. That is the purpose of it, to prevent the increase of new corps and the permanency of the present ones.

I should think it very strange if the Senate would adopt a proposition that was against the action of the committees of both bodies of Congress, against the unanimous and very earnest judgment of every member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, against the judgment of the President, the Secretary of War, the Commanding General of the Army, and the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I sympathize thoroughly with what has been so well said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and I beg to assure the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that he is very much mistaken if he thinks that opposition to the new military establishment proposed is confined to the Military Committee. It is a wholly unnecessary proposition to the health, safety, or efficiency of the Army. The veterinarians are a very proper adjunct to the Army, but they are essentially no part of the Army; and a bill which would provide that the privates, colonels, majors, and captains who have been in the service of the United States fighting its battles for two years should not be eligible to any office but that of second lieutenant, and then go out and scour the country for veterinarians to make colonels and majors, would bring our Army into ridicule amongst the people.

There is no propriety, Mr. President, in giving to these gentlemen, however learned they may be, however scientific they may be, military rank. To salute a colonel and to find out that your colonel was a person who had nothing to do with military affairs, and whose whole function and profession in life was to attend to the health of a soldier's or an officer's horse, is to bring the whole military establishment of the United States into ridicule.

It is to be regretted, Mr. President, that any adjuncts to the Army except those who are fighting men should have military rank. Military rank should imply something. It should mean that the man who held it was a soldier and that he was expected to share not only the hardships of the Army, but the dangers of the Army.

Now, out of convenience and out of consideration for those who are the fighting men of an army, the laws do confer military rank upon the surgeons who attend them. If you will look at the function the surgeon is expected to perform, however, you will perceive that it is essentially different in its nature from that which the attendant of the horse is expected to perform. The surgeons go along immediately in the rear of the line of battle. They are often called upon to exercise more courage than the man who has got a gun or a sword in his hand, for, while he is occupied in his task as a soldier, the surgeon must be present and look on without doing anything. He has not the excitement or the duties and exercises of the field to divert his mind that the soldier has. If an exception should be made in any case, it ought to be made, in the interest of humanity, in behalf of those persons like the surgeons who do not go to fight, but who must be present close to the man who is wounded to relieve him if he is stricken.

Does anyone expect horse doctors to be marshaled upon the field with the general in chief to serve him as staff officers during a fight? Does anyone expect them to go along with the regiments and to expose human life right up in the mêlée of a battle in order to heal instantly the broken bone of a horse or to apply any kind of a bandage to his wounds? Certainly not.

These gentlemen are going entirely out of their element and out of their appropriate function, however wise, however learned, however scientific they may be, to come and ask the Government of the United States to install them in a bureau in Washington, to make them colonels and majors, to have them going around with all the glory of the armament of war, when their whole duty in life is to go back and look at the hoofs of the horses before they go upon a march, or to relieve a sick horse, if he is taken so from too much feed or the lack of it.

I regret that the Senate has ever passed such an amendment to a military bill. We are acting justly and generously by the veterinarians by giving them the rank and pay of second lieutenants. It is a place of becoming dignity and it is a place of sufficient pay, according to the judgment of those who preside over the Army and who are attentive to its concerns. The General Commanding the Army is against this proposition; the Secretary of War is against this proposition; the President of the United States is against this proposition, and there is no sound basis of military history or of common sense for it to stand upon.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, only a word. I am quite prepared to believe what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is prepared to prove, that the Veterinarians' Association of the United States is unanimously in favor of this bill, I think not so much, perhaps, for the good of the Army, as to secure recognition of the association, or that specialty of the profession.

When this proposition was before the Senate last session I voted against it. Nothing in the debate has occurred to change my mind about it. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that in the progress of medical development the veterinarians have contributed their share; and, in favoring the amendment proposed by the committee, I would not be willing to be understood as underestimating their importance, their fitness in that specialty of the medical profession, or as being willing to cast any imputation whatever upon their dignity. But we are to reorganize the Army for the good of the Army, and not for the purpose of giving recognition to any class of people in the country, however deserving or however learned.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] said that it was an unfortunate thing to have officers with rank without commands. Of course the doctor—the surgeon—has rank, but he has no command; the chaplain has rank, but he has no command. But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], in what he has said, has very clearly expressed the distinction in function between the surgeon and the veterinarian. He might have gone a little further by way of illustration. When a man receives a wound in the leg which renders it impossible for him to recover without the amputation of the leg, the surgeon amputates it; but when a horse's leg is broken, they amputate the horse. [Laughter.] That is the difference.

I think it would be a very extraordinary thing for Congress, against the protest of the Secretary of War, against the protest of the General of the Army, to incorporate into this bill this proposed veterinary corps. There has been great pressure for it. One objection I have to it, and the principal objection I have to it, is that I am utterly opposed, unless the necessity for it is demonstrated, to establishing a new corps or bureau in the War Department. We can engage ourselves in no better way than in affording flexibility and elasticity to the Army organization, and eliminating, as far as it can reasonably be done, fixed bureaus. To me the notion of appointing veterinarians, with a colonel at the head of them, a distinct corps, who is independent of the colonels of cavalry, independent entirely of the colonels of artillery, is intolerable. I can see no reason for it.

Another thing which has been disclosed here, Mr. President, by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY]—and it could very easily have been foreseen without any inference being made from his observations—is that this is only a beginning in this development. They may have such a corps in foreign armies. It may be useful to them or it may not be useful. We are not called upon to pattern our organization upon foreign armies, unless, after consideration, we regard it as important to the organization of our Army. Once established, this bureau and its function will be to increase and enlarge itself. The same pressure which has been brought to bear upon both Houses of Congress to secure its establishment will be brought to bear upon every Congress to give it additional power and additional importance. If we establish it, with its head a colonel, in the next Congress our attention will be called to the fact that we have recognized this bureau as of importance; we have created it, and that it is the only staff of all the staffs at the head of which is only a colonel. "Why this discrimination?" we will be asked. The Quartermaster-General is a brigadier-general, the Adjutant-General is a brigadier-general——

Mr. KENNEY. No; he is a major-general.

Mr. SPOONER. The Adjutant-General is a brigadier-general, except temporarily—I had not finished the sentence—the Commissary-General is a brigadier-general, the Surgeon-General is a brigadier-general——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And the Chief Signal Officer.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Chief Signal Officer is a brigadier-general. "Now, in the name of all that is decent," the veterinarian will say to you, "why discriminate against this corps of scientific gentlemen?"

The next step will be to make him a brigadier-general. Then from that promotion the four majors will become colonels and the four captains will become majors. That will not be the end of it by any means. The next proposition will be that the meat purchases for the Army shall be made by this corps, because of their peculiar qualifications to determine whether meat ought or ought not to be used in given cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that will be sensible.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course it will be sensible. There will be a good many men who will insist that it will be sensible.

The next proposition will be that if this corps is organized for the purpose of looking after the horses of the Army, they should be charged with the function of buying horses for the Army. The next proposition will be that it is nonsense to have a scientific corps looking after the health of the horses of the Army and purchasing horses for the Army and have some other department purchasing the feed and prescribing the diet for the horses of the Army. So it will be claimed, and it will be asked with some show of reason, I admit, that this new department or new corps should be given the function of purchasing the forage for the Army.

So you go; and it will be a well-developed staff corps after the usual fashion in a short time. If that were proposed to-day, not five men, I think, in this Senate would vote for it; and yet there are not five men in this Senate who do not know that what I say is to follow in time if we reject the amendment proposed by the committee and create this new staff corps, and create it, Mr. President, against the protest of the Secretary of War—I will not say "protest," but the Secretary of War in his statement before the committee said the President was not in favor of it. He had a right to say that, because of the unique circumstance that had been stated in advocacy of this provision in another place that the President favored it. The Secretary of War is opposed to it; the General of the Army is opposed to it, and the whole theory, as has been repeatedly said here this afternoon, upon which we are proceeding in the reorganization of the Army is opposed to it.

For one, I would not seriously object, I think, although I am not certain it would be wise, to giving veterinarians some rank. To do that does not involve at all the creation of a staff corps of veterinarians. I am not certain that they ought to be given rank; but I am certain, Mr. President, so far as I have been able to consider this subject, that we ought not to establish a new staff corps in the Army, and that the amendment proposed by the committee striking this proposition out should be adopted by the Senate. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I will offer but a word in contribution to this debate at this late hour.

I have favored fair recognition of the veterinarians in the Army. The constant increase of knowledge has reached the veterinary surgeons of the country, and great progress has undoubtedly been made in that line of investigation and scientific research; but I am unalterably opposed to the establishment of an additional corps in the Army. First, it will result, as the Senator stated, in the establishment of an additional bureau here, which, with the customary grasping disposition of new bureaus, will begin to reach out, octopus like, to get additional authority over affairs pertinent or not pertinent to the particular office of the veterinary surgeon.

This proposed bill as it comes to us would pay a colonel $3,500 per year, who would probably reside at Washington; a major, $2,500 per year, who would probably reside at Washington as the assistant of the colonel; four captains, at $2,000 each, or $8,000; making a sum total of $14,000 per year to be paid for the skeleton of this proposed corps establishment.

Mr. BUTLER. Where are the captains to be located?

Mr. CARTER. I have no doubt every one would get to Washington who could possibly get here by any hook or crook.

Mr. GALLINGER. In that respect they would not be different from the balance of the officers.

Mr. CARTER. They would not be different from the balance. They would fall right in line. There seems to be something in the air here that is very attractive, and I suppose the veterinary surgeon would take the disease about as quickly as anybody else.

This is but the entering wedge to a line of expense in connection with corps establishments. The expense should not be considered if it added to efficiency, though the expense should be somewhat commensurate with the amount of the outlay; but, according to my judgment, based upon what has been said by those well informed upon the subject, this new corps would be a disorganizing rather than a reorganizing force.

It will be remembered that when Cortez invaded Mexico his victories were for a time chiefly due to the belief among the natives there that the horse and the man were inseparably joined together and constituted some sort of a creature of which they had theretofore no knowledge. Fright seized them in consequence of the appearance of the horse with the rider upon him, and from that time to this the horse and the rider have been very potent factors in battle, but when commanded by the same person. Now, this veterinary corps would put one man in command of the horse, while the Army regulations would put another man in command of the rider. The rider would be useless as a cavalryman unless the horse could go forth; and yet the veterinary officer might say, "That horse shall not go into battle to-day. I think that he has the influenza or he is threatened with pneumonia, or his hoofs are not in proper order." A conflict of authority in the progress of military operations is simply intolerable; it leads to inefficiency and conflict where direction and the utmost efficiency is needed when action is called for at all.

It has been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that this body is estopped, practically speaking, from a reconsideration of the view expressed on the 4th day of last May. I have before me the report of the proceedings of this body upon that day, and I find, on page 5117 of the RECORD, a statement of the vote as cast. Twenty-five Senators voted in the affirmative and 23 Senators voted in the negative, making 48 votes cast. Out of the 48 votes cast the proposition was carried by a majority of only 2. Thirty-nine Senators are reported as not voting upon that occasion. Now, Mr. President, it is barely possible, I indeed think quite probable, that the 39 Senators who did not vote upon that occasion may have views upon this subject which, in a parliamentary sense, is before the Senate for consideration and disposition now. It was carried by a bare majority in a Senate where the attendance was light. I doubt not that a motion to reconsider upon the following day, with a very slight change of the Senators in attendance, might have reversed the verdict based upon that light majority.

Mr. President, reference has been made to the nurse corps established here. In that behalf I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the nurse corps may be terminated at discretion. The language is as follows:

That the nurse corps (female) shall consist of 1 superintendent—

Not a colonel; no person of rank—

1 superintendent, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, who shall be a graduate of a hospital training school having a course of instruction of not less than two years, whose term of office may be terminated at his discretion.

At the discretion of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War may appoint a superintendent of nurses to-morrow and discontinue that office on the day after, or revoke the order within an hour. There can be no just analogy drawn between this temporary arrangement for the organization of the nurses of the Army without rank, without authority, without any menace of conflict in the organization and command of the Army, with the proposition here to start out a corps, with a colonel selected, perchance, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], from private life, placed in this high position in preference to officers who have served a lifetime to reach a lieutenant-colonelcy. There can be no just comparison. The fact that the nurse corps was provided for in this tentative and temporary manner certainly ought not to constitute any basis of criticism upon the committee in view of its position here and now taken.

The nurse corps, I am advised by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], is organized at present precisely as suggested in this bill, except that under it a superintendent of nurses may be provided by the Secretary of War to hold the position at the discretion of the Secretary of War and to be discontinued when he may think fit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KENNEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is this amendment subject to an amendment at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is there any rule that will prevent an amendment to the amendment at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is now informed that this has been held to be an amendment in the first degree. It will be in order, therefore, to offer an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. CARTER. I understood that, by unanimous consent, it was agreed that all the amendments of the committee were to be first disposed of, and that thereafter any Senator might offer an amendment to the bill or to any amendment adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that was the understanding.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am satisfied if the amendment be subject to amendment after adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply want to say a word or two on behalf of the committee amendment.

I think it would be a great misfortune if the provision were left in the bill creating a new corps of the Army in the War Department of veterinarians, with a colonel at the head of it. It would introduce interminable confusion throughout the cavalry and the mounted artillery, where those officers would be assigned. The bill as it passed the other House provides for a colonel, a major, 4 captains, and a number of first and second lieutenants.

Mr. CARTER. Ten first lieutenants and 20 second lieutenants.

Mr. COCKRELL. It provides for 10 first and 20 second lieutenants. That is absolutely unnecessary from a military standpoint. The bill as reported to the Senate gives 2 veterinarians to each cavalry regiment and 1 to each mounted artillery regiment. That is ample. We give them the pay of second lieutenants, which I myself think is a mistake. I think we ought to give them a fixed salary. They ought not to be placed as officers. In my judgment they ought to be civilian employees, just as the dental surgeons are civilian employees. We do not give those men any rank.

Mr. DANIEL. They have no rank.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say they have no rank; and it would be a great mistake, in my judgment, if we adopt the provision in the House bill as it comes to us. I hope the Senate will agree to strike out the entire section in regard to veterinarians, and then we shall have provided in the bill 2 veterinarians for each cavalry regiment and 1 veterinarian for each artillery regiment. The amendment proposed by the Senator in regard to salaries can then be made.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I agree with the several statements that have been made about the undesirability of having a conflict between colonels for men and colonels for horses. As has been suggested, the colonels for men might one day want the men who are mounted on horses to move and move rapidly, and the colonels for horses might think it would be cruelty to animals to double-quick them on that day; and then the colonels for horses might report the matter to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and they might take it up and deluge us with an unlimited quantity of humane and "benevolent assimilation" matter on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me a word?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. How would that be different from the present situation as between the colonel in the Medical Department and the military officer? Might not the medical officer say that the Army was not in condition to move? But does he do so? Is not the Senator picturing a condition that is not going to happen? Is it not a mere visionary thought that is floating through the Senator's brain in reference to these colonels of horses?

Mr. BUTLER. We have had so many things that have been called visionary, and then they materialize into grim, ugly realities—many of which we have had cited in the discussion of this bill—that I think a man of really sound mind is justified in stopping to examine a thing that looks even visionary, provided it is at the same time an ugly vision. I do not deny that this proposed amendment is inconsistent, in view of some of our past legislation. We have been very inconsistent. Now, shall we be consistent in our inconsistency? We are discriminating right now, if we vote down this amendment, against these men, if we are consistent in our inconsistencies.

I was very much interested in what was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] who has just taken his seat—a venerable statesman, a wise man. What he says always has great weight with the Senate, and in this connection I am reminded that when the last Army bill was before us we put in it a provision making a general—a major or a brigadier—out of a clerk. On that occasion I asked why a man holding a clerical position was to be given the high rank and increased pay of a general, etc., and the only response I could get in the Senate from those favoring it was that he was probably the most efficient clerk in the War Department; that he handled the papers and kept them in their pigeonholes and had them labeled so systematically that when a Senator wanted to see some musty paper he could produce it quicker than any other clerk they knew of. If I am not mistaken, the venerable Senator from Missouri favored that proposition at that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from North Carolina to produce the RECORD showing that I did.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the Senator, then, whether or not he favored that provision in the last Army bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know what provision the Senator is talking about.

Mr. BUTLER. It was understood that the Senator from Missouri was largely instrumental in having Mr. Ainsworth, who was the head clerk in the Record and Pension Office of the War Department, promoted to the position of brigadier-general, with the rank, pay, and perquisites of that high position for life.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, I can explain that, if you are talking about that matter. Ainsworth was a lieutenant-colonel, regularly in the Army and had been in the Army all his life, when the Record and Pension Office was established, and that gave him the rank of colonel. The present President of the United States and the former Secretary of War, in their official reports to Congress from 1897 to 1899, recommended that he should be promoted. That was one of the special recommendations.

In the Army bill that was passed he was given the rank as long as he held the present office. I followed the President's recommendation; I followed the recommendation of the Secretary of War; and I was heartily, ten thousand times heartily, in favor of the provision. I have no apologies on earth to make for it, for if there is any one man in the Government service who has paid a hundred times, over a hundred times, for every rank and provision he has got, it is that one man.

Mr. BUTLER. That does not explain at all. The President of the United States recommends the passage of the present Army bill, increasing the Army to 100,000 in times of peace; also the Secretary of War recommends its passage. If their recommendation was good as to making a brigadier-general out of an efficient clerk of the War Department, it might be equally as good as to why we should increase the Army to 100,000 men, increase the permanent debt of the country, to say nothing of the other objections to adopting this measure in the shape in which it is.

When that monstrous proposition was before us I opposed it. I asked for the reason for it. The only answer I could get was that Mr. Ainsworth was a good clerk, and that he was, by his systematic methods, a great help to Senators who wanted to get at some paper or record in his office in a short time. And for this reason, and for this reason only, he was to be made a brigadier-general. When I learned that this kind of proficiency in a high-up clerk was a sufficient cause to produce a brigadier-general, I proposed that we should not make any invidious distinctions, but should make also the man who had shown more proficiency in line than any other a brigadier-general—a man who, in fact, was the superior to all others in the Government service, and who is the greatest possible comfort to every Senator. I urged that he should be made a general, with all the pay, rank, and perquisites above all other men in the Government service for that kind of proficiency.

I refer to the venerable Gen. (?) Amzi Smith, who does much more for our comfort than all the other clerks in the Government service combined. The Senate deliberately and with the approval of the Senator from Missouri discriminated against him, and to-day he has not even the rank of captain.

Mr. President, the fact that we have been inconsistent will not make me vote to continue the inconsistency, but I thought probably it was not out of place simply to call attention again to this at this time, when it is proposed to have "horse colonels" and "men colonels," with conflicting authority, put into this bill. I shall vote against the "horse colonels" just as I voted against the "Clerk-General Ainsworth," and for the same reason. Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. KENNEY. I will detain the Senate but a moment.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make an inquiry. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KENNEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to inquire of the Chair what it is that the roll is to be called upon. As I understand, the roll is to be called upon the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the entire committee amendment, the Chair is informed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Striking out section 20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Striking out and inserting.

Mr. FORAKER. Striking out section 20 and inserting section 16?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. We understand that after it has been adopted, if it shall be adopted, we will have the right to move to amend it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, only a word. I desire to submit a brief reply to the argument used by the distinguished Senators from Wisconsin and Montana. The burden of the argument of those distinguished Senators was that if this corps should be established there would be a conflict between the officers created by this provision and the officers of the line; and the distinguished Senator from Montana pictured to the Senate a most grave possibility when he called our attention to the fact that on some day, when the American Army was about to enter into battle against an enemy, the veterinary surgeon, one of these majors or captains or lieutenants, would go to the general commanding the Army and say, "We can not fight to-day, because there are so many hundreds or thousands of the horses that have the influenza, or, if you please, the glanders."

There is no man who in sober judgment will for one moment suppose that should this amendment carry there will ever be a conflict between those of the veterinary corps, if established, and the officers of the line who are in the command of troops. These people are not to be in command of troops. These officers, should this provision be adopted and the corps established, would be there looking after the health of the horses, and instead of being in the way of battle, they would have put in condition the cavalry and artillery horses of the American Army, so that it could fight battles and win victories. It is the most absurd proposition that I have heard advanced in this argument.

Then there is the question of having this corps established in the city of Washington. I appeal to the Senator from Montana as to where he would have the headquarters of the veterinarian corps, if such a corps should be established. Would he have it in the Philippines; would he have it in Hawaii or in Porto Rico? Where would he have it? Would it not be a proper place to have the headquarters of that corps established in the War Department in the city of Washington, where an officer, whomsoever he might be, could have direct control and direction as to the duties and responsibilities of the several officers under him? If the Senator will read the provision of this amendment, he will find that all the rules and regulations governing this corps are to be subject to the Secretary of War. Those rules and regulations could be so made and would be so made that there could be no question of conflict between the officers of this proposed corps and the officers in the line of the Regular Army.

The distinguished Senator calls to the attention of the Senate the fact that when this amendment was agreed to in the Senate on the 4th day of May, last year, there was a vote of 25 for the amendment and 23 against the amendment. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the distinguished Senators who voted for that amendment. Starting off with the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], you can read the list down from top to bottom. I desire that the list of the members of the Senate who voted for the amendment may be printed in the RECORD, and let us see who stood for the amendment then.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think nobody questions that if the bureau is established, the purpose is to establish it in the War Department——

Mr. KENNEY. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. To keep it growing. That is what is the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. In order that there may be no further misunderstanding about it, I will announce publicly that the conditions of the pair have been changed so that we protect each other only when requested to do so. He has not requested me to protect him on this vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. He is not present, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). My colleague on this vote is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania. If he were present he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay," as I understand it.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer my pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. It has been arranged to transfer the pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who has a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. Under that arrangement I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SEWELL (when Mr. KEAN'S name was called). My colleague will return in a very few moments. He is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE].

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). As the senior Senator from Vermont has explained, I am paired with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If I voted, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. MONEY (when Mr. SULLIVAN'S name was called). My colleague has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. I do not know how he would vote on this matter.

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but in accordance with the transfer announced by the Senator from Kansas, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENNEY (when Mr. TURNER'S name was called). The Senator from Washington is detained from the Senate on important business. He has a pair upon this question with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. If the Senator from Washington were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], but by reason of its transfer, whereby that Senator stands paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 43, nays 5; as follows:

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to inquire whether section 32 of the bill has been acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 32 in the revised number of sections?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been acted upon, the Chair is informed, and agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not open to amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; under the unanimous consent given, that after the committee amendments were acted upon all amendments could be offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. All the committee amendments have not yet been acted upon. There are several reserved committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to page 36 of the bill, line 24. The Senator offered an amendment, and it was not completed.

Mr. SEWELL. That whole section has been revised by the committee. The chairman of the committee ought to have the amendment to offer.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont in regard to this matter?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that I expected, indeed I am rather bound, unless there is some very strong reason to the contrary, to vote for a proposition to give the veterinary surgeons some increased Army rank, and perhaps some reasonable increase of pay. I had also hoped to have an opportunity to vote at some time for an institution which would educate this class of practitioners, to be under the charge and direction of the Government, here or somewhere else in the country, instead of the private institutions which now exist.

I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if I understand him correctly, that the committee do not mean to be understood as committing themselves against either of those propositions when they come up by rejecting this amendment, which is objectionable only for some other reason. I should like to have an assurance from the committee, or the Senator from Vermont, if he is ready to give it, that that part of the desire of the veterinary surgeons is not understood as condemned by this action.

Mr. PROCTOR. The committee were opposed to granting rank to these people because they considered that there was no occasion for it. As I stated, they believed the principle was wrong to grant rank where there could be no command. Their sentiment, I am sure, without any special action, was to give all the pay that was necessary to command the best equipped and most experienced officers, and the evidence before us was that even with the former pay there was no trouble in that respect. We have increased it, and I do not believe we should object to any increase that was reasonable.

As to the educational institution, that is a matter which was not considered. The present appointments are made from graduates, on a very careful competitive examination, with an expert from the Agricultural Department as a member of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to be allowed to say for one that the best veterinary surgeon of modern times is a man of very high scientific attainments, or he should be, and there is no doubt, I suppose, that it has ceased to be a calling wherein an illiterate and ignorant man can do as well as anybody else.

We ought to have in the Army a rank for them. I do not speak now of the power of command. I speak of the title. It seems to me that the veterinary surgeon ought to have a title which would imply a higher rank than that of second lieutenant. A second lieutenant is the lowest commissioned officer in most military arrangements. Sometimes there is a lower grade. In some armies in Europe they have a lower grade than that. A man who ought to be equal in attainments to the foremost scientific man, if he has any title at all which designates rank, should have, it seems to me, rank above that of second lieutenant. What is now the equivalent of a ship's surgeon in the Navy? It is higher than that of second lieutenant.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood that the Senator from Vermont or some other member of the committee would propose amendments to this substitute when it was agreed to. I think whatever the pay is, it ought to be fixed in this bill. It is left indefinite as now provided in the amendment which has been agreed to, not exceeding a hundred dollars a month. It ought to be a fixed sum.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the Senator will allow me, the pay of the regular veterinarians is that of a second lieutenant mounted. That is fixed. There is authority given to employ others.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Vermont will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, which is eminently proper. Let the salary be a fixed sum. We are to have two for each cavalry and one for each artillery regiment, I believe.

Mr. CARTER. That is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let the two for the cavalry have, say, one $1,800 and the other $1,600, and let the one for the artillery have $1,800. Let it be a fixed sum.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the pay of a second lieutenant mounted?

Mr. COCKRELL. Fifteen hundred dollars.

Mr. PROCTOR. Fifteen hundred dollars—$125 a month.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the pay should be greater for these skilled veterinarians.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be two to the cavalry regiments.

Mr. ALLISON. As to the other suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I should be in favor of adopting it unless it shall turn out, as I believe it will, that a great many of the States in the Union have established veterinary colleges. We have in Iowa a department in our State agricultural college where veterinary surgeons are graduated, and many of them have graduated with the highest skill and attainments.

Mr. COCKRELL. But I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that there have been veterinarians employed here in the city of Washington ever since I can recollect about Washington, and they have had no trouble in getting competent men at $100 a month.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be true in Washington, but I should think——

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not propose that as the salary, but if you give the principal one of a regiment $1,800 and the other $1,600, that is nearly the pay of a first lieutenant and a second lieutenant.

Mr. ALLISON. I would give the others fixed pay.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments are not yet disposed of.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to offer an amendment. I desire to offer an amendment and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be read.

Mr. TELLER. Let my amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of the bill after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

"That an act entitled 'An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1899, be, and the same hereby is, continued in full force and effect for the period of three years from the 1st day of July, 1901."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. PROCTOR. From the Committee on Military Affairs I propose two amendments, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 14, strike out the word "rank" and insert "grade."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 16, strike out all of section 24 after the words "Military Academy," and insert the following:

Persons not over 40 years of age who have served as volunteers subsequent to April 21, 1898, may be ordered before boards of officers for such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and who may establish their fitness before these examining boards, may be appointed to the grades of first or second lieutenant in the Regular Army, taking rank in the respective grades according to seniority, as determined by length of prior commissioned service; but no officer appointed under the provisions of this section shall be placed above another in the same grade with longer commissioned service, and nothing herein contained shall change the relative rank of officers heretofore commissioned in the Regular Army.

Enlisted men of Volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants in the Regular Army under the same conditions now authorized by law for enlisted men of the Regular Army.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is a very important amendment, and I ask the committee to allow it to be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to move to insert on page 31 the words "and fifty" after the words "two hundred," in line 9. It gives 50 additional privates to the Signal Corps. The chief officer of the Signal Corps desires the amendment very much indeed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, line 9, at the end of the line, after the words "two hundred," insert the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

Two hundred and fifty first-class privates.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know the reason for this proposed increase. There ought to be some reason for it besides a mere motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. The reason for it is the reason given for any addition of force anywhere that is needed. There is an immense telegraphing establishment or establishments, an immense number of lines, and continually growing, in the Philippines and the near-by islands, and there is much laying of cables. There is a heavy expense, of course, connected with it, and there is no small danger to life in the Signal Service. They go out to make communication, and two or three of them will be dropped by shots from the bushes. They are especially liable to that guerrilla warfare.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BATE. Is that the amendment which relates to the Signal Corps?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BATE. There is another amendment on the subject, one that I have offered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let us dispose of this one first.

Mr. BATE. Its adoption may defeat the one I have proposed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think perhaps this is the one the Senator is thinking of. It gives 50 privates more in the Signal Corps.

Mr. BATE. Oh, no; that is not the one. My amendment gives 100 more. This is a very important matter. It involves the increase of some officers there, and I think it ought to go over. I ask that the amendment may be laid over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator desires to postpone action for a day?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; because I want to see the relation it bears to the other amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table until to-morrow. Are there further committee amendments?

Mr. ALLISON. We had under consideration a moment ago an amendment to section 22.

Mr. ALDRICH. We passed it over with the others.

Mr. ALLISON. They have been passed over. The committee will present them to-morrow, I hope, because I think that section ought to be amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment, as I remember it, relating to the Army canteen or post exchange, as the committee has now christened it, was passed over. I rise to request that that may go over until to-morrow, as there are some matters I want to look up in connection with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the amendment known as the canteen amendment may lie over until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. SEWELL. I do not rise to object to that request, but to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the two amendments pending now, one for the increase of the Signal Corps by 50 first-class privates, and the other suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], increasing the hospital stewards of the Army 100, might be acted on to-night. There is no reason why they should go over.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Tennessee has asked that they may go over.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that there is no reason why the amendment should go over. We are perfectly ready to act on it.

Mr. BATE. I have an amendment here that I think covers it, and it extends much further. It comes up in the morning and will be here printed in the morning.

Mr. SEWELL. Your amendment proposes an increase of the hospital stewards from 200 to 300.

Mr. BATE. Is that the one you refer to?

Mr. SEWELL. That is the one I think might be acted upon.

Mr. BATE. I thought you spoke of the Signal Corps.

Mr. SEWELL. That is an increase of 50.

Mr. BATE. And this is an increase of 100.

Mr. SEWELL. For the Hospital Corps?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; and I should like to be heard upon it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from New Jersey is under a misapprehension. The Senator from Tennessee has two amendments, one as to the Hospital Corps and one as to the Signal Corps.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not think there is any objection on the part of the committee to either of them, and they may be acted upon now.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator from Tennessee is willing, suppose we adopt the amendment of adding 50 privates to the Signal Corps.

Mr. BATE. I prefer that to go over. I want to compare that in the morning. There are several other things to go with that proposition, and I want to put them together. I think that is proper to be done. I am doing it at the request of General Greely, the head of that corps, and I want to see it done in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an amendment passed over on page 39.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, if you will allow me a minute I will say, in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from New Jersey in regard to the Hospital Corps, that I have no objection to taking up that amendment and acting upon it, for I think the committee all agreed to it this morning. I do not think there will be any trouble about it wherein we increase from 200 to 250, but we increase the hospital stewards a hundred. The Surgeon-General approached me about it. As the law is now, he can not appoint a hospital steward unless he has been in the service for a year, and then he has to be in a certain time as an assistant before he can be appointed. That is the substance of it. He said to me that he could not perform the duties properly out in the Philippine Islands now for the want of this class of men, and he asked me to put it in for a hundred, and it is for a hundred hospital stewards. There is no commission about it, as you know. The object is merely to get the service of these men. He wants men properly prepared for this place, and he wants to get some of them from outside, because he can not get them in the Army.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. BATE. I ask to have the amendment read, if the clerks have it at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BATE. I said I had no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey to taking up the amendment and disposing of it so far as it relates to hospital stewards. I think the committee this morning agreed unanimously that it should be done.

Mr. SEWELL. If the amendment is at the desk, let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. BATE is, on page 26, line 7, after the word "examination," to insert the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War be authorized to appoint in the Hospital Corps, in addition to the 200 hospital stewards now allowed by law, 100 hospital stewards: Provided, That men who have served as hospital stewards of volunteer regiments or acted in that capacity during and since the Spanish-American war for more than six months may be appointed hospital stewards in the Regular Army: And provided further, That all men so appointed shall be of good moral character and shall have passed a satisfactory mental and physical examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment?

Mr. SEWELL. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask to have it printed and go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not know it. I have not examined it. I should like to have it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, then, the amendment will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MONEY. Has the amendment of the committee on page 29 been voted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it has been.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to give notice that I will refer to that section to-morrow and offer certain amendments to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator has that right. On page 39 there is an amendment, which was passed over, striking out section 37 and inserting a new section. That amendment has not been acted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that may go over until to-morrow, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to give notice of an amendment, and have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I offer an amendment and ask that it be printed, and also printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to section 40, page 43, the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the President shall appoint a commission of nine persons, among whom shall be competent physicians and other scientific men, who shall investigate and report to Congress at its next regular session as to the effect of the sale of beer in such exchanges, canteens, or transports upon the health, discipline, and morality of the Army; and that meantime the sale or dealing in beer shall only be permitted under strict regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 8, 1901, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD. On page 652, when the gentleman from Maine on Saturday had the floor, this colloquy took place:

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, now, I deny it. I am not as familiar with pettifogging as the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will prove it out of the RECORD itself.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is all right enough if the gentleman from Maine thinks he can effect anything in that way, because if there is any man who knows better than another what can be done in that way it is the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Maine never yet defended a criminal, but he has prosecuted several in his time and he is after one now.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is the line of argument that we would expect from the gentleman from Maine from his previous course upon this floor, and I want to say to him right now that that will not change the course of the majority of this committee in the least. The facts that were presented by me yesterday are facts that I am willing to stand by regardless of the attitude of the gentleman or his remarks to me personally this morning.

Now, in the revision, the gentleman from Maine has stricken out the charge, or the statement, that the gentleman from Maine never yet defended a criminal, but has prosecuted several in his time, and has left in the answer I made so it makes my answer to the first proposition the gentleman made entirely out of place. Now, I have no desire to have that statement which the gentleman made regarding the criminal in the RECORD if the gentleman on reflection desires to take it out; but what I insist is that the RECORD shall be corrected so I shall not be put in a false attitude in the RECORD itself. I say to the gentleman from Maine if he desires to eliminate the criminal charge I am willing the RECORD should be corrected, and the elimination of my answer also. But I am unwilling to have my answer stand without the other going in.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I found on examination of the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois on the preceding afternoon, that he had eliminated, in editing his remarks, the statement he made about the State of Maine robbing other delegations, and, having noticed that fact, I thought I would take the same course with my distinguished friend and make the elimination which I did. I am perfectly willing, however——

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me interrupt the gentleman right there. I will state to the gentleman that in my speech of the previous day there was nothing that misrepresented the gentleman from Maine. What I am complaining of is that he put me in a false attitude in the RECORD.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Maine has no desire to do that, and had no intention of that kind. I made the elimination to parallel the elimination made by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not desire to make the gentleman from Illinois appear improperly in the RECORD. What is the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Maine can take his own course, either insert his remark or eliminate my answer.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will leave that to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. No; the gentleman from Maine is the one that must do that; whether he leaves it in the RECORD or not is immaterial to me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is entirely immaterial except that it may suit the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. I will make such amendment in the RECORD as he thinks puts him right.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is not for me to say. The gentleman made the charge, and it is for him to say whether it goes into the RECORD or not; but if it does not go in, then it is entirely proper that my answer should be taken out.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will leave it to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. No; the gentleman can not shift the responsibility.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it seems to be a question of who shall take the initiative, and I ask unanimous consent that the answer of the gentleman from Illinois be eliminated from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the RECORD be corrected by eliminating the answer mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that ought to be done unless it is done by the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no objection to that course, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois. Either course is satisfactory to me. I shall not stand here to insist that the gentleman from Illinois shall insert in the RECORD the charge of robbery that he made in reference to the State of Maine and inferentially against "the gentleman from Maine." If he wants that to appear in the RECORD, or if he desires it to be taken from the RECORD (as he has already had it done)—if he wishes the matter to stand in that way, that is agreeable to "the gentleman from Maine."

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment right there. The gentleman can not shift the responsibility. There is nothing in my speech that misrepresents the gentleman from Maine. There was no change made in my speech that has any such effect. And it is not entirely frank for the gentleman to attempt to avoid assuming the responsibility in his own case.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I have no desire to misrepresent the gentleman. The reason for making the elimination was precisely what I stated. If the gentleman from Illinois desired to remove from the RECORD a severe and harsh statement, I did not wish to be behind the gentleman in such a proceeding.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, it is a little remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman should retain in the RECORD my answer to a remark which was eliminated, the effect being to put me in a false attitude in the RECORD. If he desired to eliminate my answer, I was here all day; he could have seen me and obtained my consent to eliminate that answer, if he had thought fit.

A MEMBER. He had no right to change your remarks.

Mr. HOPKINS. But he could have seen me and asked that privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I could not hear his statement. Are we to understand that the gentleman from Maine edited into the RECORD some intimation or insinuation——

Mr. HOPKINS. No; he edited out of the RECORD a statement that he made, to which I had made an answer; and he left in my answer, the effect being to put me in a false position in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But the point was, as I understood, that the gentleman from Maine edited into or edited out of the RECORD the statement or innuendo that he was after a "criminal." I would like to know which it was.

Mr. HOPKINS. He took that out, but left in the RECORD my answer; and what I complain of is that this puts me in a false position.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish "the gentleman from Maine" to suggest that that answer go out? Would that be agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. Entirely so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well, then, I make the suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the RECORD will be so amended.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear what is going on, and we do not know what this agreement is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Maine have agreed that the answer of the gentleman from Illinois appearing in the RECORD shall be eliminated.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. All right.

REAPPORTIONMENT.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up the bill which we have had under consideration—House bill 12740—making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Twelfth Census. I have consulted with gentlemen on the other side about the time for closing debate on this bill and for taking a vote on the various propositions which will be submitted to the House. It will be agreeable to both sides, I think, so far as I have been able to get their views, that the general debate run on to-day and also to-morrow until 3 o'clock; that at 3 o'clock to-morrow the bill shall be read and considered in the House under the five-minute rule, subject to amendment and five-minute debate, but that the bill shall be finally disposed of before the adjournment to-morrow; the time occupied in debate to be equally divided between the friends of the bill of the committee and those of the Burleigh bill; and the chairman of the committee to control the time in favor of their bill and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. PEARSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry—whether this agreement requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly it does.

Mr. PEARSON. I shall be obliged to object unless some little hearing be given to me on this matter. I understood from the gentleman from Maine that I should be allowed thirty or forty-five minutes; but he informs me this morning that there is such a demand upon him that he will not be able to carry out that arrangement. I desire to say that so far as my State is concerned, and my district is concerned, no question has been presented in this Congress of more importance than this, and I can not vote intelligently for my people.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, there has been plenty of time for debate. Speakers had to be hunted up on Saturday, and the debate has run now longer than it ought to, in view of the other legislation coming on. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing that plenty of time shall be given to everybody; but the gentleman must know that after general debate shall close there will be the five-minute debate, and then I will ask the privilege of printing speeches on this subject for ten days, so that everybody can have a full opportunity of having his views made known.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do you expect to permit only one substitute?

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, there may be only one substitute; but I will say to the gentleman that the committee's bill is subject to amendment until it is perfected, and then after that the Burleigh bill is to be offered as a substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that does not pass, will the gentleman permit another substitute?

Mr. HOPKINS. You can have but one substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand you can have only one substitute, but if it is voted down I would like to offer an amendment, and I hope the gentleman will not demand the previous question before I shall have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, I have no desire to object.

Mr. PEARSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois, for whom I have a very high regard, if he is not willing to make it half past 3?

I do not ask to close the debate, but desire to have thirty minutes. I ask that with a good deal of feeling, as a heart to heart thrust——

Mr. HOPKINS. I appreciate the position of the gentleman from North Carolina, and I have given away one hour's time more than I expected to in order to meet just such a demand as that of the gentleman from North Carolina; and I will say this, that under the five-minute debate, if too much time is not taken in voting, the gentleman can get time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for us to hear, and we can not agree to any arrangement that is made unless we understand what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is impossible to hear at the desk what is being said by gentlemen, and the House will please be in order.

Mr. PEARSON. I would like to have it understood that I am to have time.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. As the gentleman from North Carolina asks time, I am sure the gentleman from Illinois is willing that he shall have it, and I hope there will be no objection to giving him twenty minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I believe that the matter can be arranged between the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and myself.

Mr. PEARSON. I want that result to be certain.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to say this: I do not desire to delay this matter, but the State of Washington is deeply interested in this bill. It requires that State to have 257,000 people to give us one Representative. Now, I want some time upon this bill. I do not want the time to talk to my constituents, but to present facts to this House, and I would like to have twenty or thirty minutes out of this general debate. I do not feel like consenting to fix a time without having some understanding as to what I am going to get.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I see no objection to having an evening session, if some of these gentlemen desire it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to have my request put as I made it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Including an evening session?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; not unless it is asked for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending bill continue to-day and to-morrow until 3 o'clock; that thereupon debate shall be had under the five-minute rule for amendment, and that a vote shall be taken on the bill before adjournment to-morrow, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Illinois on one side and the gentleman from Maine on the other. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. On assurances that I am to be taken care of as nearly as possible, I will not object.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that Virginia is very much interested in this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. Virginia will be taken care of.

Mr. OTEY. On the assurance that Virginia will be given thirty minutes I will not object.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that Virginia will have more than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to make a statement in reference to a pair. On Saturday I agreed to see that Mr. WANGER was paired in the RECORD. I had arranged a pair with one of my Democratic colleagues. Through a mistake it failed to go in the RECORD. It will appear, however, in the permanent RECORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] has written to know why he was not paired. I merely make this statement so that it may go into the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a personal explanation in reference to this matter myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the Chair has not yet recognized me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized as entitle to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the gentleman proceeds, I will ask one more unanimous consent, and that is for leave to print speeches in the RECORD for the next ten days, and also permission to extend remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that leave to print be granted for ten days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall content myself with voting for the majority bill in this controversy. I shall first vote to strike out the amendment offered by the committee, because I believe that Congress has no power to direct the States as to the manner in which they shall divide their districts. During the first fifty years of the Republic Congress merely apportioned the Representatives and said nothing of districts in the States.

In 1842 Congress said the districts should be composed of contiguous territory. While that was objectionable, yet contiguous has a certain meaning, and can hardly be susceptible of more than one interpretation. This committee amendment proposes to put in the words "and compact," which, I submit, is unwise as well as unauthorized by the Constitution, because "compact" may be liable to various constructions and become the cause of great confusion hereafter. Disappointed and defeated candidates, ever ready to complain, may base contests upon the shape of their districts and give the House an opportunity to unseat the successful candidate, and opportunity is often deemed duty.

The Constitution says that the Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States. After the States receive this apportionment, in my judgment, the powers of Congress are at an end. Congress should not go into the States and direct the creation of the districts. My colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ], a member of the Census Committee, with his usual ability and diligence, has fairly and fully considered the pending measures, and his conclusion meets my approval.

But, Mr. Speaker, not only are the Burleigh substitute and the majority bill pending, but the Crumpacker bill is also before this body. Since the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] seem disposed to push this proposition to the front, I think it proper that it should be met at this time.

As is well known, immediately after the war, when the fourteenth amendment was adopted, it had in view negro suffrage throughout the South, but it did not attempt to compel it. It held forth an inducement to the States to grant it. That inducement is found in the fourteenth amendment, in the second section, the penalty of reduced representation being declared against States that refused the right of suffrage to the negro race. President Lincoln never wanted negroes to become voters. He recognized that the white race is superior to the black one, and, as he said in his speech at Charlestown, these two races could not live upon terms of equality, that there were physical differences which would prevent them from so living, and since that was a fact he declared himself in favor of assigning the superior position to the white race.

That sound view was not altogether obliterated when the fourteenth amendment was adopted. But in the days of reconstruction, and as I believe in hostility to the white people of the South, the opinion grew that negro suffrage should be forced upon the people of the eleven Southern States, and so the fifteenth amendment was presented and compelled to be adopted throughout the South by means that can not be approved by honest men, while great States in the North were voting their disapproval of it. Without the compulsory and vicious means used in the South it would not have been adopted. However, as Mr. Boutwell, who had charge of the fifteenth amendment while pending in this body, said, it was designed to carry out the powers placed in Congress by the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment.

It prescribed that the right to vote should not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. That was the ultimate purpose of the second section of the fourteenth amendment, which had the penalty of reduction of representation in it. Mr. Speaker, that being the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, and the fifteenth amendment being the enforcement of that purpose, then unless a State violates the fifteenth amendment Congress has no power to act against her under a fair and reasonable interpretation of these two articles of the Constitution construed together.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years of Congress, says:

> When therefore the nation by subsequent change in its Constitution declared that the State shall not exclude the negro from the right of suffrage it neutralized and surrendered the contingent right it before held to exclude him from the basis of apportionment. Congress is thus plainly deprived by the fifteenth amendment of certain powers over representation in the South which it previously possessed under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

When the fifteenth amendment says that the States shall not deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the mentioning of these three conditions, in my judgment, is an exclusion of all others, and is tacit permission to the States for any other cause than race, color, or previous condition of servitude to abridge or deny the right of suffrage without penalty. The United States Constitution in no wise deprives a State of the right to prescribe qualifications for her voters, nor does it, in my judgment, impose any penalty upon the exercise of that right, and the true meaning of the fifteenth amendment is that if a citizen has the qualifications prescribed by a State, then his right to vote shall not be denied on account of race, color, or previous condition. But I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this proposition, that when the State of Massachusetts has an educational qualification, and the State of Pennsylvania a tax-paying qualification, it is not a denial of the right of suffrage.

If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] will consider, he will find a vast distinction between a denial of a right and the qualifying of that right. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the act of Congress which excludes from the mails newspapers, etc., containing advertisements of lotteries and other lottery information does not abridge the freedom of the press. It is certainly a qualification of it. We frequently have rights which are absolute in themselves, and yet in order to enjoy them we must qualify ourselves. Requiring those who desire appointments to stand a civil service examination is not a denial of the right to hold office. When we say that a man must be registered before he can vote it is not a denial of the right to vote. We merely tell him that he has the right but before he can exercise it he must qualify by registering. The law may tell him that he must pay his poll tax before he can exercise the right he already has.

Massachusetts tells him that he must be able to read and write before he can exercise this right, and when Massachusetts imposes the educational qualification upon a voter she has not denied him the right to vote, she has not abridged his right to vote, because, as I gather from the dictionaries, abridgment means to cut off. It practically means the same thing as to deny. You have not cut off a man's right, you have not denied the man's right to vote when you prescribe reasonable qualifications.

The late Senator Charles Sumner in debating suffrage admitted that knowledge was a proper qualification for a voter. Hon. George S. Boutwell, in answer to a direct question, said that the fifteenth amendment would not prevent property or educational qualifications.

Mr. Speaker, the State of North Carolina, which has been so greatly misrepresented here, in my judgment, has not denied the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. But I will not now discuss this, as during the last session I fully discussed the North Carolina amendment. She has prescribed reasonable qualifications. Chief among them is the educational test, the test that Massachusetts, Wyoming, Connecticut, and other States have. After 1908 no one registers under the so-called "grandfather" clause for the first time. I will append the whole amendment to my remarks when published. Mr. Speaker, I think that there is a bitter sectional spirit in this proposition to reduce the representation of North Carolina and other States.

While the great majority of business men in the North, and, I believe, its best and most patriotic statesmen, bear no sectional spirit hostile to the South, this proposition has shown that many men in the North still are ready to arouse sectionalism and create prejudice against the South. The time has not yet come when the Republican party can be considered the friend of the South. Let those who have thought so consider this proposition and be undeceived. Yet I rejoice that many of the ablest Republican leaders in this House do not encourage this proposition.

I believe the record shows a partisan spirit in this attempt to reduce representation. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], in his original bill, that truly represented his purposes, instead of decreasing increased the representation of Massachusetts and decreased the representation only of Southern States. The Congressional Directory, showing the vote by which members of this House were elected, shows that in the State of Massachusetts in 1898 there were only 22,000 votes cast in each Congressional district, while in the State of North Carolina there were cast in each district 36,000 votes.

In the State of Pennsylvania there were cast only 29,000 votes in each district; in the State of Maine, 18,000; in Vermont, 21,000; in Rhode Island, 19,000. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana had dealt with Massachusetts as he dealt with North Carolina, instead of increasing the representation of Massachusetts he would have reduced her representation from 13 to 6, or in about that proportion.

But, Mr. Speaker, if you believe that the conduct of Massachusetts and North Carolina falls under the operation of the second section of the fourteenth amendment, how should you proceed? The only possible way for fair men to reach the proper result would be to find out, in the first place, a matter which these gentlemen on the other side have not fully considered, whether, except for crime, any man's right to vote is denied, which we controvert; second, whether the fourteenth amendment in that respect was not completely merged into the fifteenth amendment, as I contend it was; and then, finally, if he concludes against us on those propositions, it would be his duty to find out exactly how many people of North Carolina could vote under our laws when they become effective, and how many would be legally refused the right to vote when they endeavor to comply with the election laws, and also the grounds of such refusal.

The gentleman will tell you when he considers these questions that there will not be a thousand white men in the entire State of North Carolina who will fail to vote if they so desire. He will tell you that there will not be to exceed 50 per cent of the colored men who will not vote if they so desire. He will find that our reduction in any event could only be in the proportion of about 15 to 100, as the recent census will show only about 30 per cent of our population to be colored—perhaps not that much. But instead of these just figures, the gentleman presented a bill which reduced the representation of North Carolina to 5 members, cutting off 4 of her 9, while at the same time he put up the representation of the State of Massachusetts to 14 instead of her present number of 13. And yet everyone who can qualify under the law of Massachusetts can qualify under the North Carolina amendment.

A qualification, Mr. Speaker, is something that is attainable. If a State should say that a man should not vote unless he had red hair or blue eyes, since the color of his hair and eyes are fixed, that would be cutting off the right of others to vote; but when you prescribe a reasonable qualification, one that is attainable—and I am but giving you the definition of a qualification that Mr. Sumner gave in the Senate—when you prescribe an attainable thing, which is reasonable, it is a mere qualification, a qualification of a right that still exists in the voter. While if you deny the right on account of color the black man can never become a voter; if you deny the right to blue-eyed men, a blue-eyed man can never become a voter. These would not be qualifications. They would be denials and abridgments, but when you prescribe a poll tax or an educational test, you are prescribing reasonable qualifications within which every citizen may bring himself.

Another proposition. If, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] both contend, the laws of Louisiana and North Carolina are unconstitutional, why should you base upon an unconstitutional act an attempt to deprive a sovereign State of its just representation? Sirs, if you believe these provisions are unconstitutional, you should regard them as nullities, presume that they will be so declared, and should not attempt to cut down the representation on that account.

Mr. Speaker, representation and taxation should go together. It has not been claimed that voting and taxation should go together, for women, insane people, and minors pay taxes. The man who does not vote pays his part of the taxes just as the woman, the minor, and the nonvoter do. The individual voter now represents the women, children, and nonvoters. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] would deny representation to these tax-paying nonvoters. While we have only placed the nonvoter in the same category with the women and the children, they place him upon the level of the mule and the ox, and would deny him representation.

If you are going to let the number who vote determine representation in the House, then you will increase the representation of Colorado, Utah, Idaho, and those States which extend suffrage to women. That would be proper as a matter of right from their argument, aside from constitutional provisions.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], in my judgment, on Saturday did his native State a grave injustice in his fourth or fifth annual diatribe against the Democracy of North Carolina. We have heard him often, and his latest revised edition perhaps contains more venom and injustice than any of his former efforts. It is not a new assault that he delivers. He argued that the white counties of North Carolina were Republican.

I deny it. Take the election of August, 1900, and, eliminating every single county with a black majority in the State, it went Democratic by 39,000 majority. Take the election of November, 1900, and, eliminating every county that has a black majority, the State went for Bryan and Democracy by 15,000. Under the election law that the gentleman's own party gave our people, an election law that gave the Fusionists in North Carolina the absolute control over the election, the people of North Carolina were so shocked and shamed at the rule the Republican party had given the State that they hurled them from power by a majority of 24,000 in November, 1898.

The gentleman talks about the counties of Halifax and New Hanover. In one county he says the Democrats got a vote of about 3,000 and Republicans only 2, and that the other gave more votes than it had registered voters. Ah, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had been entirely candid, and, not arguing from a partisan standpoint, intended to give the members of this House a fair understanding of the conditions there, the gentleman would have gone one step further and would have told you that the county of New Hanover had been afflicted by his own party with 86 negro officials. He might have told you that the same spirit that thrills the white man in North Carolina thrills the white man in Indiana, where recently white mobs lynched two negroes for murdering a white barber. He might have told you that the spirit that thrills the white man in North Carolina is the same that thrills him in Pennsylvania, the home of the gentleman who is so anxious to investigate these matters.

He might have gone to Illinois and found that wherever the white man looks to the blue sky the spirit of superiority and progress stirs within him. He would have told you that under the disgraceful and shameful régime inflicted upon the people by the Republican party the white men did rise in their might and hurl them from power. The gentleman wants to know if that is fair. Was the election conducted fairly? I tell you in the light of a sound philosophy, in the eye of civilization and justice, it was fairer and juster than the disgraceful régime that made that revolution necessary. [Applause.]

The white people there have done no more than such people would do in any community. Wherever the negro race numerically predominates in the South there the white men stand almost unanimously together. As the negroes throughout the State vote almost solidly together, so the overwhelming majority of the white race, with its superior virtue and intelligence, vote together, and they must necessarily do so to preserve their civilization and their supremacy. Those who think that negro majorities in several counties of the State should control those counties and their good towns may criticise Democratic successes there; but they can certainly deceive no one by asserting that there is no danger in negro domination since there are more whites than blacks in the State.

One might as well have told the citizens of this city in 1864 that there was no danger in the Confederate army, since there were four times as many Federal soldiers as there were Confederates. The deception in the assertion is disclosed by the fact that in many localities the black race predominates, and in those localities the danger is, although the State has a large white majority. As an example, the county of New Hanover three years ago, when the Republicans were in control, had a negro register of deeds, negro deputy sheriffs, 40 negro magistrates or justices of the peace, a negro county commissioner, and its great city, Wilmington, had several negro aldermen, several negro policemen, and negro health officers.

The Democratic party of the South is against such conditions and believes it right to take constitutional steps to prevent their return, and the Republican party has in vain attempted, and will in vain attempt, to stop its progress. It has interposed against the Democracy 90,000 negro votes in North Carolina, but the Democracy triumphed. Its continued fight on our amendment will hurt itself and help us.

Mr. Speaker, since the civil war long years have passed. Is it not time for the country to be given rest from sectionalism? Can gentlemen still in the North grow in popularity by condemning the dominant element in the South? If so, let us hasten the passing away of such conditions. I appeal to the patriotic members of this body, and I hope they all are patriotic, to set the seal of disapproval upon the Crumpacker proposition, and let the country know that Congress will not for prejudice or unjust cause undertake to strike down the power of any sovereign State.

APPENDIX.

The North Carolina constitutional amendment adopted by the voters at the general election held on August 2, 1900.

ARTICLE VI.

SUFFRAGE AND ELIGIBILITY TO OFFICE.

SECTION 1. Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized, 21 years of age, and possessing the qualifications set out in this article, shall be entitled to vote at any election by the people in the State, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. He shall have resided in the State of North Carolina for two years, in the county six months, and in the precinct, ward, or other election district in which he offers to vote four months next preceding the election: Provided, That removal from one precinct, ward, or other election district to another in the same county shall not operate to deprive any person of the right to vote in the precinct, ward, or other election district from which he has removed until four months after such removal. No person who has been convicted, or who has confessed his guilt in open court upon indictment, of any crime the punishment of which now is or may hereafter be imprisonment in the State's prison shall be permitted to vote unless the said person shall be first restored to citizenship in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. Every person offering to vote shall be at the time a legally registered voter, as herein prescribed, and in the manner hereafter provided by law, and the general assembly of North Carolina shall enact general registration laws to carry into effect the provisions of this article.

SEC. 4. Every person presenting himself for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the Constitution in the English language; and before he shall be entitled to vote he shall have paid, on or before the 1st day of May of the year in which he proposes to vote, his poll tax for the previous year, as prescribed by article 5, section 1, of the constitution. But no male person who was on January 1, 1867, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under the laws of any State in the United States wherein he then resided, and no lineal descendant of any such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote at any election in this State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications herein prescribed, provided he shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this section prior to December 1, 1908.

The general assembly shall provide for the registration of all persons entitled to vote without the educational qualifications herein prescribed, and shall, on or before November 1, 1908, provide for the making of a permanent record of such registration, and all persons so registered shall forever thereafter have the right to vote in all elections by the people in this State, unless disqualified under section 2 of this article: Provided, Such person shall have paid his poll tax as above required.

SEC. 5. That this amendment to the constitution is presented and adopted as one indivisible plan for the regulation of the suffrage, with the intent and purpose to so connect the different parts, and to make them so dependent upon each other, that the whole shall stand or fall together.

SEC. 6. All elections by the people shall be by ballot, and all elections by the general assembly shall be viva voce.

SEC. 7. Every voter in North Carolina, except as in this article disqualified, shall be eligible to office, but before entering upon the duties of the office he shall take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the constitution and laws of North Carolina not inconsistent therewith, and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of my office as ——— ———. So help me God."

SEC. 8. The following classes of persons shall be disqualified for office: First, all persons who shall deny the being of Almighty God. Second, all persons who shall have been convicted, or confessed their guilt on indictment pending, and whether sentenced or not, or under judgment suspended, of any treason or felony, or of any other crime for which the punishment may be imprisonment in the penitentiary, since becoming citizens of the United States, or of corruption or malpractice in office, unless such person shall be restored to the rights of citizenship in a manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 9. That this amendment to the constitution shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1902, if a majority of votes cast at the next general election shall be cast in favor of this suffrage amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the measure proposed by the minority of the committee might properly be denominated "a proposition to still further reduce the opportunity of members of the House to debate the questions before it." We have just had a striking example of the inability of this House to debate by the discussion this morning as to leave to print, or the cogitation in the RECORD that is to take the place of debate in the House. Why is this? Why should members be compelled to write for the dead RECORD instead of talking to the living members? It is because of the size of the House.

If the House were 360 members, and in the short session should set apart one hour to each member for debate, you will find by computation that, including the holiday recess, there are exactly 360 debating hours in the whole time, giving five hours session each day; so that the 357 members and three delegates (making no allowance for the delegate from Hawaii, who ought to be counted)—but I take 360 because there are only 360 hours, and there would be just one hour apiece for each member.

The result of this enlarged House has been that rules have necessarily been adopted to cut off debate and take away from this body its deliberative power. If you increase the number to 400 you still further curtail the rights of each member. But the proposition is to increase it in this way, so as to keep the progress of the country parallel with the slow growth of population in Maine and Virginia.

I have prepared a table, which I will insert in my remarks, that will show what has become of the population of Virginia and Maine.

From the Congressional Directory, which I have examined for the purpose, I find that the Senators and Representatives representing the various States give their nativity as follows:

Foreign born, 22.

Maine has to-day in this Congress, in the Senate and House, from various States, 10 members. She would have under the present apportionment only 6. And yet Maine has on the floor of the two Houses of Congress Mr. ALEXANDER of New York, Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, Mr. FLETCHER of Minnesota, and Mr. PERKINS of California, in addition to her own membership. Take the State of Virginia and she would be entitled to 10 Representatives and 2 Senators, total 12. She has in the Senate and House to-day 26 of her sons as members. Her population has been exported. Some of these wanderers have been returned to Congress. I was up in Maine a few years ago taking depositions in a will case with a distinguished Maine lawyer, and we took a team and a notary public along with us, and traveled over York County, in the district lately represented by Speaker Reed, at present represented by the gentleman from Maine, Mr. ALLEN.

The six witnesses first examined, in response to the interrogatory "What is your name, age, place of residence, and occupation?" gave their age in each case as over 80. The seventh witness, when I asked him his age, said "64." I said, "You are quite a young man." He replied, "Yes, for Maine." [Laughter.] The old men remain in the old homes. The young people have emigrated from Maine. They have "gone West to grow up with the country." And they have made themselves felt wherever they have gone. A Maine man is like a Scotchman, of whom it has been said that "whenever you find anything in this world that is worth anything you either find a Scotchman sitting near waiting for it or sitting down on top of it." So with Maine men; wherever you go in the United States you will find a Maine man leading the procession. Maine has now the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, coming by way of Illinois, in the person of Justice Fuller.

Mr. OTEY rose.

Mr. LACEY. I will say to my friend from Virginia that if the same thing might be said in regard to that State modesty would forbid me to say it.

Mr. OTEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LACEY. I have but fifteen minutes, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. OTEY. You are from Virginia yourself, I believe?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. OTEY. That is all I wanted to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I pleaded guilty to that charge, by indirection at least, a moment before the gentleman asked the question.

Now, sir, we can not keep the membership of this House within reasonable bounds and at the same time keep the growth of the membership in line with the growth of Virginia. Why? Because people who have the honor of being born there move away to some place where the soil is more fertile. That is the natural course of the human race.

I have given the nativity in the table of the members of all the States. Twenty-two of them are from foreign countries, and the balance were born in the United States. Now, take the State of Ohio. She is entitled to 23 representatives in this body and in the Senate. She has 37 native sons in the two Houses of Congress. California has an organization known as "The Native Sons of California." Yet California has no "native son" in either the Senate or the House—because the people of that State are mainly men who have been born somewhere else. But we can not continue representation in this House upon the present ratio without making the House too cumbrous for the transaction of business.

Why, sir, the very gentlemen who ask for the adoption of the minority report on this bill, increasing the membership to 384, complain constantly that even now there is no time for debate. The appeal is made to the chairman of the committee controlling the present bill, "Give us leave to print our remarks in the RECORD." Why is this? Simply because the House has outgrown in numbers a body in which debate can be fully, intelligently, and profitably carried on.

When the number of offices of a certain class has been fixed it is almost impossible to ever after reduce that number. This is human nature. During the Spanish war complaint was made that some dynamite had been found somewhere in the purlieus of the Capitol. We immediately put on twelve additional policemen to protect the Capitol from the Spanish dynamiter. The Spanish war is over, and now the same twelve extra policemen are protecting us from the Filipinos! [Laughter.] If we should come back here a thousand years from now, those twelve men, represented by their successors, would be found watching for Spanish dynamite! It seems impossible to abolish an office when once it has been created. We have the number of Representatives now fixed at 357. Increase that number to 386 or 390 and it can never be reduced below that number.

The proposition of the majority now is to continue the House at its present number—burdensome, cumbersome, and unwieldy as the body now is, making business and debate difficult enough. That is the proposition; and I think that, in the light of our experience, we ought not make any increase. The House is already not only big enough, but too large.

A State makes a mistake when it assumes that its dignity in Congress depends upon the number of its Representatives. Take Maine, for example, with only 4 members. Those 4 Representatives from the Pine Tree State in past Congresses have controlled and shaped the legislation of this country beyond those of States with four, five, or six times that number. The influence and power of a State in this House depend on the strength and character of its delegation. The time must come when Maine must be cut down to 3 Representatives, or else this House must become still more unwieldy than it is to-day.

Under the Constitution one-fifth of the members present may require a roll call and the record of the yeas and nays. At present calling the roll and announcing the pairs, followed by a recapitulation of the vote, requires almost one hour with the present membership of the House. To increase the number of the membership adds greatly to this difficulty.

I do not think the opportunity for deliberation ought to be reduced by any material addition to the present large membership. Under the Constitution a majority of the whole constitutes a quorum. In Great Britain a quorum of only 40 members of the House of Commons is required.

The larger the membership the harder it is to obtain and preserve the attendance of a quorum. Let us not embarrass the House further by adding to the burdens of the quorum and roll call.

I called the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] the other day to the inequalities of the bill proposed by his colleague [Mr. BURLEIGH]. Take the population of Maine, multiply it by 3, and it does not equal the population of the State of Iowa, an excess of over 38,000 remaining. Multiply the representation of Maine by 3, and it would give Iowa 12 members. With more than three times the population of Maine, Iowa's quota is less than three times that of Maine by one member. The Burleigh bill proposes to give Iowa 11 members and Maine 4. It thus appears that it is not equality of representation that some gentlemen are seeking, but inequality. They are desiring to retain the present number of Representatives in their States in any way that it can be done, without much reference to the inequalities that may result elsewhere.

This is perfectly natural. We find the same thing in Maine that we do in other States. Take the State of Virginia, the grand old "mother of Presidents." She has made but slow growth. It must continue to be slow. With the mountains that cover her surface in part, and with the poverty of the soil in other parts, the increase of population must necessarily be tardy. Many good men stay in Virginia; many good men move away from it—so, too, with Maine.

Then compare the States of the West. Indiana has become an emigrating State. So with Ohio. Ohio would be cut down one by this bill. But there are already 36 of her sons in Congress, while 23 is the limit of her own delegation under existing law. An Ohio man, wherever he goes, turns his face toward the capital of the country, and in many cases is sent here by constituencies, the mass of whom may be born in other States. How is it with the State of New York? New York has 36 of her own Members and Senators at present, and yet there are 48 natives of New York in the two Houses, because New York is a great State for emigration. Her sons will be found in every nook and corner of the Union.

Indiana, which will lose 1 member under the proposed bill, has 15 members and Senators now, and yet there are 17 Indianians on the floor of the two Houses.

A MEMBER. How about Massachusetts?

Mr. LACEY. My friend asks about Massachusetts. Massachusetts has 15 members and Senators, and yet there are 21 natives of that State in the two Houses to-day. So, then, it is perfectly obvious that we can not take care of those States that are growing more slowly than the average and keep up the representation which they now have, and at the same time not enlarge this body beyond the limits necessary for reasonable transaction of business. One-third of the population of Iowa are either directly or indirectly from Ohio. One-third of the people of Kansas are either directly or indirectly from the State of Iowa. The emigration is thus moving on first to Indiana, then to Illinois, then to Iowa, and then to Kansas.

But complaint is made about the reduction of Nebraska. That is largely due to the overcapitalization of the population of Nebraska in the census of 1890. The city of Omaha has apparently declined 40,000 from 1890 to 1900. That decline is apparent and not real. It is unquestionably a result of the fierce competition between Omaha and other cities on the Missouri River in the census of 1890. The same condition exists elsewhere to-day. There are cities whose census has been taken this year that will undoubtedly show unsatisfactory growth in 1910 because they have succeeded in some degree in padding in the year 1900.

It is impossible to retain the present membership of all the States (much as we should like to do so) and at the same time recognize the wonderful growth of some of the other States.

As to the reduction of the representation of Louisiana, South Carolina, Mississippi, and North Carolina because of the disfranchisement of the colored voters there, it seems to me that there is no room for debate. The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

The mandate is decisive and imperative. These States may, under the guise of requiring an educational qualification, deny the right to vote to a portion of their male inhabitants, but in doing so they must incur the penalty of a proportionate reduction of their representation in Congress.

The justice of this is self-evident, and the obedience to the Constitution is required by the official oath of every member of Congress.

If these States desire to deny the right of suffrage, they ought to be willing to accept the result of the reduced representation required by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized for one hour.

[Mr. CRUMPACKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this contest, involving as it does very important political and public considerations of at least ten years' duration, centers around the Hopkins bill and the Burleigh bill, the one providing a House of 357 members and the other a House of 386. There was a very interesting prelude in the resolution introduced last week by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] in which, like King Philip of old, he marched up the hill and down again, accompanied in his grand march by the solid vote of that side of the House, one of whom was the distinguished chairman of this committee, accomplishing finally the result which might as easily have been attained by simply depositing his resolution on the desk of the House, which in due course would have been referred to the proper committee, as was ultimately done. That is followed by the discussion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], in which he makes a very able argument upon his incongruous, imperfect, wild, and fantastic bill, supported by a very lengthy report, in which he seeks to cut down the representation of four States—South Carolina, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Louisiana—to the extent of about 40 per cent of their present representation. Of course we all understand that it is mere brutum fulmen. That is the last this Congress will ever hear of it, except perhaps some formal vote at the end of these proceedings.

The real issue, and to that I shall chiefly direct my attention, is whether the Hopkins bill or the Burleigh bill, either or both of them, with or without amendment, shall be adopted by this House and this Congress.

Now, I shall not ascribe improper motives to the chairman of this committee. Ascriptions of that sort may be made with greater ease than justice. I accord to him the same candor, earnestness, and fairness that I claim myself. He, with a majority of the committee with him, adopts the number 357, because, in his good judgment, that is the number which he desires above all others to be adopted by this House. The gentleman has managed his side of this question with the very great ability, tact, and skill for which he is already renowned. He has associated with him, as a bulwark behind which he presents his case, the titanic Webster. He uses him as his authority, and asks this House to swallow, cap, boots, and all, his number 357, because, forsooth, if Webster were here he would do the same thing. Now, my friend, in all sincerity, of course, is simply hoodooing this House, as I shall show you beyond all question by the figures I shall present.

I shall show that he has not followed Webster, that he has departed from Webster, and that the only thing in the world he has followed is, blindly, the tracks of the Congress that adopted the eleventh apportionment, ten years ago. If that Congress had said that this House should be composed of 400 members, my friend, with the same logic, with the same argument, with the same consistency, would have favored 400 now. If that Congress had said 350, why 350 would be his number to-day. Three hundred and fifty-seven is his Dulcinea; he levels his guns at every other number that would dare to compete with it. It is his pet number, the present number of the House, and he makes the figures to suit it, as I shall show you. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to tell this side of the House that 357 has been adopted by the majority of this committee, led by the chairman, notwithstanding its effect is most unfairly, most unjustly, and in violation of every precedent of every apportionment that has ever been adopted in this country to summarily rob three States of a member to which each is entitled under the very system or process which he ostensibly applies.

Why does not he select 360 instead of 357? "Oh," he says, "that would disturb the beauty, the symmetry, the perfection of my process, which is based on 357." Why is 357 necessary? The answer is that 357 is the present number of the House, and that we have a large enough body already. The whole argument, then, is based upon the present membership of the House and the gentleman's unwillingness, his stubborn refusal, to adopt any other number than 357. Has that number any special charm? Is there any special reason for adopting it? Is there anything wreathed about 357 that commends it to his mind above every other number in the long list of tables? There can not be, unless it be that it is the present number of the House, and he would not deny this the other day when I put the question to him squarely.

I have stated that the gentleman does not follow his number consistently; and I am going to prove it. There are two systems, one of which must always obtain in this matter of apportionment. One of these is the system by which you adopt a fixed ratio—say 30,000 or 52,000 or 150,000, or whatever it may be; and the respective States receive their apportionment of members in accordance with the quotients arising from such divisor. That system obtained until 1830—until the Sixth Census. Then there was quite a dispute between the committee of the House on the one hand and the committee of the Senate on the other, Mr. Polk and Mr. Webster leading the respective sides. Mr. Polk contended that the old system should obtain, by which you would adopt a fixed ratio and allow the number of Representatives to be dependent upon the quotient which might arise in each case from the application of the divisor, disregarding or eliminating fractions.

Mr. Webster in his able report, a part of which I shall read in a moment, contended that the number of the House should first be fixed and then the apportionment by population be determined by that divisor. Under the Fifth Census the Polk system or process prevailed; but under the Sixth Census the Webster process was adopted, with a variation. That variation was that a State which had a majority fraction should be allowed representation upon that fraction. Ever since 1840 we have adopted in this country the Webster process, by which we first determine upon a fixed number of Representatives as the divisor. This system has been followed, with the variation whenever necessary. For instance, whenever there has been a majority fraction remaining, that majority fraction has always been treated as entitling the State to a Representative. My friend from Illinois in framing this bill has not followed the Polk process, because that disregards all fractions; and he does not follow the Webster process, because under that process majority fractions are always recognized. In this bill of the committee we have the first departure from the established system.

Now let me read what Mr. Webster says, and gentlemen will see that the bill of the gentleman from Illinois does not follow that system. This part of Mr. Webster's report which I shall read is in some unaccountable way left out of the citations which you will find in the report of the majority of the committee:

> The rule has been frequently stated. It may be clearly expressed in either of two ways. Let the rule be that the whole number of the proposed House shall be apportioned among the several States on their respective numbers, giving to each State that number of members which comes nearest to her exact mathematical part or proportion.

That is the new method, the method which Mr. Webster recommended, with variations.

Now, here is the composite method to which I shall call the attention of the House in reference to some tables which I shall submit:

Or let the rule be that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that in addition to the number of members resulting from the division a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of the division.

That is the rule which, if adopted, would give these three States an additional member. That is the rule which is invoked by the table of 384 presented by the Burleigh report. Mr. Webster goes on to say:

Either of these, it seems to the committee, is a just and fair rule capable of uniform application and operating with entire impartiality. There is no want of a common proportion or of a common divisor. There is nothing left to arbitrary discretion. If the rule in either of these forms be adopted, it will never be doubtful how every member of any proposed number for a House of Representatives ought to be assigned. Nothing will be left in the discretion of Congress. The right of each State will be a mathematical right easily ascertained, about which there can be neither doubt nor difficulty, and in the application of the rule there will be no room for preference, partiality, or injustice.

Now, let us follow Webster. That is all we ask—let us follow the rule laid down by Webster, and which has been followed ever since with the variations which that rule permits. My friend from Illinois—and I ask him to correct me if I am in error—when he adopts the number 357 deprives these three small States of representation, although they have majority fractions. He says that he does this because if we should allow them representation by majority fractions it will necessitate the adoption of a new table and the allowance of majority fractions for other States. But why follow that table at all? Why does he not follow Table 4? I call his attention to page 101 of the report. His ratio is 208,858—only 142 short of the round number 290,000.

Now this Table 4 has been printed for the information of every member of the House, yet the chairman of this committee has not referred to it once. He has disregarded entirely the old system, and while he follows parts of the new system he rejects others. He asks this House to follow him blindly. He ridicules the majorities of these three States by showing how possibly this rule might give Maine a little more than she is entitled to, because her majority fraction is small.

Suppose he had started out, not with 357 Representatives, but with 209,000 as the ratio, what would have been the result? Every one of these States that are included in his bill would have received the representation that they do receive by his bill, and in addition thereto Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota would have received one member each. It is an illustration of the difference between the old system and the new system. The one system works fairly, by which there is not a single majority fraction left over, as Webster said should be the case, while the other gives us only 357 members, and three majority fraction States are left out. The gentleman objects to a membership of 360. Why? Because if he does allow those three members to be added, that will break up the symmetry of his process. That is his reason.

He says you can not add anything to it because it would make 360 instead of 357, and then he says you will have to start all over again with 360 as the divisor and create an entirely new table. He is wedded to 357 and you can not get him away from it, whereas if he had taken the other set of tables, if he had taken Table 4, on page 101, by simply making the divisor 309,000 even instead of his number—208,868—every State in the Union with a majority fraction would have received representation. My friend can not answer that. The figures are there and the effect of that jugglery of figures is to deprive these three States of their proper representation. The gentleman's only justification of it is that that is the process he started on and he wants us to swallow his process.

Now, what about the bill of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]? It is constructed strictly in accordance with Table 4, with the exception that Iowa is not allowed one member that she is entitled to. The proper number is 387 and not 386. The original Burleigh bill was correct. In committee it was reduced to 386, and Iowa in consequence lost one member. Now, how was that reduction made? Simply because Webster's first process was followed by Mr. BURLEIGH instead of his second.

If my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] will look at page 107 of the report he will see that by adopting 194,000 as a divisor, Iowa will have one more member, the number of members reported as shown in the bill originally introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. That is under the fair process by which every majority fraction in every State is allowed representation. The reason Iowa does not get that additional member is that the minority of the committee attempted to follow the first process, and as a result the majority fraction did not save Iowa. Three hundred and eighty-four was the number they started with. They added two for Virginia and Nebraska and left Iowa out. But if you start with a fixed number of population instead of a fixed number of members as a divisor, it is impossible for a major fraction to be left out, and that is the system that ought to obtain in this Congress and in other Congresses hereafter in framing apportionment bills.

Page 107 of the report shows that with 194,000 Iowa gains one. Under the Burleigh bill Iowa does not gain one, simply for the reason that the new process is adhered to with variations by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]; whereas if the old process had been adhered to, with "majority fractions" variation, Iowa would have gotten her just deserts, or if she lost one member my friend could not complain. Simply by adopting that method Iowa would get her full quota as indicated in the original Burleigh bill.

Now, the difference between the Burleigh bill and the Hopkins bill in their operation is this: In the Hopkins bill no allowance is made for major fractions in three States, because, as the gentleman says, the residuum of 22 is exhausted before these three States are reached, there being 25 States with majority fractions. Under the Burleigh application of the same system every State with a major fraction is accorded representation by simply adding to the original number with which he started. Both those applications are wrong because the system is wrong, inasmuch as it necessarily involves the deprivation of some of the States of representation for major fractions. The proper system, indicated in Table 4, the adoption of which will secure almost the same ratio of population, does not deprive any State of representation for a majority fraction, and that is the same principle which Mr. Webster said ought to be adopted by Congress.

So it strikes me that the number 357, advocated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], chairman of the Committee on the Census, should not be adopted by this House. It deprives three States of representation. By any other process in the world except by the Hopkins process they will not be deprived of this membership. The gentleman has adhered neither to the old system or the new. He has not adhered to any precedent or any apportionment that has ever been adopted in this country. The RECORD will sustain me in that statement, and the gentleman can not say to the contrary. Then why should we follow him blindly when his only reason is that it is the present number of this House, notwithstanding the fact that it admittedly deprives States of their just representation?

If the people of the United States are to be represented in this their Government, they can nowhere be so directly represented as in the House of Representatives. The burden of the National Government far exceeds that of the State. In one year there is paid into the National Treasury by the people of a State more than their own State, county, and city treasurers collect from them in twenty years. They have the right to keep close to Washington and to closely guard legislation there enacted and government there administered. The House has always kept pace with the growth of the country, in its membership, by every apportionment except one, that of 1842, in which it was reduced by Senate amendment.

Ten years ago it was fixed at 356, the population being 62,622,250. The country has grown to 74,565,906 of representative population, an increase of nearly 12,000,000. Then there were 356 Representatives to 88 Senators, about 4 to 1. According to Mr. HOPKINS'S bill, with Arizona and Oklahoma yet to be admitted, the ratio will stand 360 to 94, or 16 short of 4 to 1. By his bill the States of Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, and Virginia each lose one of their present number, notwithstanding the increase of population in those 8 States during the past decade is over 1,500,000. That reverses the policy of Congress in the eleventh apportionment, when this was the plan adopted by the committee.

Trials were made until a number was found that would give a ratio which in application would secure each State against any loss in its membership and in no instance leave a majority. This number was found to be 356.

The present bill proposes to blindly adopt the conditions which existed ten years ago, notwithstanding the effect is to vitally injure eight sovereign States—a result which that Congress deliberately and specifically refused to accomplish.

The time has not yet come to call a halt in the size of the House. We do not need another Senate. If a member feels too much crowded and jostled here, he may ask his State to relieve him by sending him there. We are not in each other's way. Except on very rare occasions there are dozens of empty chairs. Debates are conducted by leaders and assistant leaders, and recognition is not such a matter of right as to occasion tumult in its being sought. Chairmen of committees, one after another, have charge of the proceedings, with space visible everywhere. Add 29 members to our number and there will be no appreciable addition to occupied chairs, and vacant ones will, except on few occasions and for brief periods, always be found waiting for and welcoming occupants.

It is needless to enlarge upon this universally admitted condition. But we are seriously told that the cost of Congress will to that extent be increased. This session of Congress will, if the Senate confirms what you have passed, appropriate for 100,000 soldiers. Thirty additional members of the House will be of less cost and expense than 150 of these soldiers! The constitutional monarchies of Europe accord to their people a fuller representation in their legislative assemblies than does Congress to the citizens of this Republic, whose distinctive characteristic and proud privilege is that they are the source of all power, all legislation, and all government.

England's House of Commons consists of 670 members, although her population is only 37,888,439. Germany, with 52,279,901 people, has a Reichstag of 397. The Italian Chamber of Deputies is composed of 508, for a population of 29,699,785. The Spanish Cortes has 431, while Spain's population is 17,550,216. The Republic of France is far more generous to its people than the United States is to its citizens, its population of 38,517,975 being represented by 584 deputies, or 1 to every 65,955 of the population; whereas even with 386 members of Congress, each member with us will represent 194,182 people.

The sovereign voters of the United States should be as directly represented as possible in their government of themselves. The larger the territory and the greater the population of a district, the farther is each person in it from personal representation. Their interests are each year becoming larger and more varied, as evidenced by the vast appropriation bills and the items composing them, and the ever-increasing mass of the subjects of legislation and bills introduced. The work of their Representatives is not confined to these walls, but ramifies all of the departments, and all during the year, even when Congress is not in session, as most of us can certify.

Now, gentlemen, I want to talk to this side of the House about another matter. It has been industriously worked upon you that the effect of the adoption of the Hopkins bill will be to save the political integrity of both parties as it now exists, and my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and others have tried to instill into the minds of members on this side of the House, with tears in their voices, the fact that if we should adopt the Burleigh bill here the inevitable result would be to give a Republican gain of 10 members. Now, gentlemen, just think about it for two seconds and a half. The argument that the gentleman brings to bear upon you is that if you do not save the Democratic party from the Burleigh bill the Republicans will gain 10 members of this House. He did it seriously and half expected you to keep your faces straight in listening to his argument. Just think of it, and the results of it——

Mr. KLUTTZ. Has not the same argument been used on the other side to whip them into line for the Burleigh bill?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. That is a correct argument, as I am going to show you.

Mr. KLUTTZ. They will gain 10.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Not by the Burleigh bill. I do not think that political considerations should control in this matter, but if there is any salvation that is ever going to come to the Democratic party it must come through the Burleigh bill and not through the Hopkins bill. Why, under the Hopkins bill two of our doubtful States are at the outset openly and unblushingly deprived of 1 member, when each is entitled to 1. Under the Burleigh bill here is our standing. The Republicans gain 21 and lose 1. Their net gain is 20. The Democrats gain 10 and lose none, a net Republican gain of 10. Now, what do they include in there? They include New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, West Virginia, and Indiana. There is not an intelligent Democrat in the United States under the light of existing conditions that does not know that the only chance the Democracy has to win in this country is by carrying those States, and unless we do carry those States, or most of them, we can do nothing.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I ask the gentleman if, under the Hopkins bill, the political situation does not remain as it is? Is not that the fact?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I say if the Republicans carry those States the Republicans will have a majority of 10; and if the Democrats carry those States the Democrats will have a majority of 8—a gain of 8.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Which is the more likely to carry them?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. So I say, accepting the surrounding conditions in these States, shall we risk nothing with reference to them? Till we do carry them, or most of them, there will not be a President inaugurated by the Democratic party.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. I understand you to assume that if the Democrats carry those States certain results will follow?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. How do you get at that result? Do you assume that all the States south of Mason and Dixon's line will continue to be Democratic?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I am not considering any of the other States one way or the other. I am simply discussing those States. If these States go Republican, then it will be 10 more for their majority, and if the Democrats gain those States they will gain 8 more for the aggregate of their majority. Do you not see the situation? Why should they bring this political argument to bear in this House to scare us away from our duty when we know that the only salvation of the Democratic party is in those very States, and we are therefore perfectly willing to make those States' representation as large as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I wish to ask the gentleman if he would discuss this feature of the bill relating to the districts, and the use of the word "compact?"

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will come to that after a while.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I see in the Hopkins bill there is an amendment.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. You mean by the addition of the word "compact?"

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The word heretofore used has been "contiguous." It has been changed by the addition of the word "compact;" and I should like to hear what the gentleman has to say in discussing that.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will discuss that matter later on.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The Hopkins bill and the Burleigh bill both contain that, and the Crumpacker bill is the only one that leaves the word "compact" out. I would like to hear the gentleman discuss the use of the word "compact" in these two bills.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will discuss it, but I only have an hour, and there are other matters that I must first direct my attention to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from South Carolina will permit me, and I know he is much more familiar with the bill than I am, I understood him to say that there are 8 States in the Hopkins bill that will lose 1 member each if it is adopted. Now, is it not feasible and practicable to pass this bill fixing the number at 357 and insert a proviso that these 8 States which would lose shall have their members, so as to make the House 365 members? Is not that practical and constitutional?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. It is practical and constitutional, that everybody knows; but——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why not make it that way?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. It was done in 1872, under the Webster process "with variation," but while Mr. HOPKINS adopts the Webster process he refuses to adopt it "with variation."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That would satisfy the gentleman, would it not?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. So far as the result is concerned; but I do not think the principle would be right. I think the correct principle is by Table No. 4, which is what was done from the beginning of the Government to 1842. Adopt a fixed number of population, and let the number of Representatives be determined in the quotient, allowing an additional member for each major fraction in a remainder. That is the only sensible and rational way, I think, of determining the matter. It is the old (or Polk) process adapted to the Webster suggestion that recognition be given to major fractions in remainders.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to interrupt the gentleman with a question, if he pleases.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. With pleasure.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand the gentleman to make an argument in favor of the Burleigh bill, because it gives to States that were carried by the Republican party in the last election an advantage of 7. Now I suggest to him that if his argument is good, and if he is going to be generous to us, he ought to go further and adopt 398 as the number, because under that apportionment the Republicans—that is, the States that went Republican in the last election—would gain 28, while the States that went Democratic would gain 13, giving us a clear advantage of 15. Now, if he is going to be generous, why not go on up to that number and give us what we think we ought to have?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. The gentleman is in error in stating that my argument on the political line was in the interest of the Democratic party. It was in reply to an argument assiduously propagated on this side of the House by leaders of your side of the House who were afraid that we were going to give the Republican party too much. I say we do not adopt 398 because it is not necessary in order to save every State to go beyond 386. That is the reason we adopted 386 as the least number possible.

Now, if you follow the course pursued in this country up to 1842 you will do it. If you adopt the course that has been pursued by this country since 1842 you will do it. The only exception, the only milestone of the century by which unfairness will be dealt to any State in the Union by an apportionment bill, will be by the adoption of the Hopkins bill.

Never before in the history of this country since fractions were recognized has a single State been deprived of a majority fraction, and even in the last apportionment the change of one vote in the Senate would have increased the membership from 356 to 359. If there had been one Senator of a different mind over there the present representation in this Congress would be 359 plus Utah, which would make 360; and my friend from Illinois would be here to-day advocating 360.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Let me suggest to the gentleman that Mr. Webster says in his report that it would be unconstitutional to deny a State a representative from a majority fraction.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Yes; I have read that. If members will stop to think for two and a half minutes and look over table 4, they will see the outrage that is sought to be perpetrated by this Hopkins bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Do I understand that you are advocating the proposition involved in the minority report?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If I understand that proposition, it proceeds on the same basis as the majority report proceeds upon.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Except that the majority fractions are allowed, while the Hopkins bill does not allow all majority fractions.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It seems to me the majority and minority have started out by taking a number arbitrarily, instead of fixing the population that one man can fairly represent in the House.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. That is the argument I made at the outset. The old method, with the "majority fraction variation," is the correct method, and it will be secured if we will take 387, because if you will look at page 107 of this pamphlet you will find that the number I mention, 194,000, will give the precise figures in the Burleigh bill as originally introduced. The difference between the Burleigh bill as introduced and reported is that Iowa is not allowed 1 additional Representative. That makes the difference between 387 and 386, and that difference was caused by adopting the new method instead of the old, which should have been adopted with the Webster majority fraction variation, suggested by Mr. Webster in his report of 1832.

Mr. LACEY. Why did they adopt the new method?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Well, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] can state that; because he wanted to proceed with his bill on the same principle as adopted in the Hopkins bill.

Mr. LACEY. Was not it because the Iowa delegation was against the increase of the membership of the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. No; we ought to have found out first how the Iowa delegation stood, but we neglected to do so. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I wish to say upon that subject.

THE NEGRO AND HIS VOTE.

I want now to talk to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] a while. I can not make an argument in full, as I intended, for I have not the time, and I shall thereby be prevented from elaborating the subject as I should wish; but I shall cite him to decisions of the Supreme Court of this country by which he will understand that his ridiculous bill can not for a moment be sustained by that tribunal.

His bill accords to every State its full number of Representatives except South Carolina, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and from each of these four Southern States he takes three Representatives, his reason for such arbitrary proceeding being that each of these States has denied the right of suffrage to at least 40 per cent of its inhabitants, and consequently its representation must, under the second clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, be reduced to that extent.

That clause provides that when the right to vote at any election for Representatives in Congress, etc., is denied to any male inhabitants of a State 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of Congressional representation therein shall be reduced in proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

The right to vote does not come from the United States, but from the State. The United States Constitution nowhere confers that right. That is explicitly decided in Minor vs. Happersett (21 Wall., 166) and United States vs. Reese (92 U. S., 215).

The fifteenth amendment, which declares that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, does not confer the right to vote. Its only meaning, purpose, and effect was this: Before its adoption preference in suffrage could be given by a State to one race over another; a State could have entirely disfranchised the negro. But now, since its adoption, if citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. The right to vote, therefore, comes from the State, but the fifteenth amendment forbids any discrimination on account of race. So says United States vs. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 544).

The fourteenth amendment did not change the relations of the State and Federal governments, as held In re Kemmler (136 U. S., 436). It did not attempt to confer the right of suffrage upon the negro, but citizenship only, which does not include the right to vote. A woman is a United States citizen, but can not vote. That amendment simply tried to force the States to accord suffrage to the negro by imposing the penalty of loss of representation in Congress, which I have already stated as the second clause. But unfortunately for the bill of the gentleman from Indiana, Congress did not rest content with the fourteenth amendment, but followed it up with the fifteenth, which declared it to be out of the power of a State to disfranchise the negro as such—the very thing which the fourteenth amendment declares shall cut down the State's representation.

The only thing, therefore, which can reduce a State's number of Representatives is declared by the fifteenth to be an impossible thing; and the gentleman is left high and dry by the last amendment of the Constitution. One of the ablest Republicans this country has produced, Mr. Blaine, concedes this when he writes:

When the fifteenth amendment declared that the State shall not exclude the negro from the right of suffrage, it neutralized and surrendered the contingent right before held to exclude him from the basis of apportionment. Congress is thus plainly deprived by the fifteenth amendment of certain powers over representation in the South which it previously possessed under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

No one has ever denied that the fourteenth amendment was aimed exclusively at the South, and, that no one may ever ignorantly do so upon this floor, I shall state a few features of the legislation which led to it.

On January 22, 1866, the reconstruction committee of the House reported this amendment to the Constitution:

Representations and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. Blaine contended that if any class was excluded from representation it should also be excluded from taxation.

Sloan, of Washington, spoke for a basis of voters.

John Baker drew attention to the fact that the proposed amendment leaves any State the right to narrow the suffrage as she pleases, so long as she steers clear of the test of race or color.

Ingersoll offered an amendment prohibiting any State from prescribing a property qualification.

Jenckes opposed that amendment as needlessly abridging the power of States.

Schenck's amendment based apportionment upon the number of male citizens who are voters. It received but 29 votes. The resolution was recommitted, and the committee reported a changed proviso:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, the persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

It carried by 120 to 46.

It was killed in the Senate.

While in that body Senator Henderson offered this amendment:

No State in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein shall discriminate against any person on account of color or race.

It received but 10 votes.

In April, 1866, the House passed and June 13 the Senate approved (with an amendment in which the House concurred) the resolution.

Senator Doolittle offered an amendment making "voters" the basis of representation. It received but 7 votes.

The distinguished gentleman will observe that thirty-four years ago the effort now made by him was essayed by Representative Schenck and by Senator Doolittle with as little success as will attend his bill. There is but one way to accomplish his desire to make registration of voters the basis of representation, and that is by the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. But that would be disastrous to Massachusetts, one-fourth of whose population can not vote because of her educational qualifications; Connecticut, California, Delaware, Maine, New York, and other States, whose laws practically disfranchise the illiterate. All States would be measured by the same standard, and the four Southern States would not stand alone as subjects of his political pruning knife.

His bill is the Rip Van Winkle of the reconstruction era. It is a misfit with this generation and these piping times of alleged good will and fraternity between the sections. Such action is out of accord with the sounds of jubilation over a reunited country which constantly regale our ears. Our people would much prefer less protestations of kindliness if accompanied with less unfriendly attacks upon their peace, safety, and prosperity.

We have no apology to make for ridding ourselves of a voting population which was never legally invested with the right to vote. In clothing the negro with suffrage the Federal bayonet took the place of the Constitution. The history of reconstruction speaks for itself and removes the subject from disputation. Neither Lincoln nor Johnson intended to inflict upon the South unrestricted negro suffrage.

President Lincoln wrote to Governor Hahn, of Louisiana, March 15, 1863:

Now, you are about to have a convention which, among other things, will probably define the elective franchise. I barely suggest for your private consideration whether some of the colored people may not be let in, as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who fought gallantly in our ranks.

In reconstructing the eleven State governments in 1865 President Johnson sent a circular letter to the provisional governors suggesting that the elective franchise be extended to all colored men "who can read the Constitution of the United States and write their names, and also to those who own and pay taxes on real estate valued at not less than $250."

The very able and radical Senator Fessenden said in the debate on the Freedmen's Bureau bill:

I take it that no one contends—I think that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts himself [Mr. Sumner], who is the greatest champion of universal suffrage, would hardly contend—that now, at this time, the whole of the population of the recent slave States is fit to be admitted to the exercise of the right of suffrage. I presume no man who looks at the question dispassionately and calmly could contend that the great mass of those who were recently slaves (undoubtedly there may be exceptions), and who have been kept in ignorance all their lives, oppressed or more or less forbidden to acquire information, are fitted at this stage to exercise the right of suffrage, or could be trusted to do it unless under such good advice as those better informed might be prepared to give them.

Nevertheless, the passions of the year succeeding the war forced upon us by Congress that condition which Fessenden said no one would even contend for. The reconstruction constitutions were adopted under the military governors by negroes and aliens; not by the citizens of the States. The States had not made voters of the recently emancipated slaves, nor had the United States made citizens of them, as the fourteenth amendment had not then been adopted.

Our negro and carpetbag constitutions were erected under the initiative of the reconstruction act of 1867, which imposed military governments upon the Southern States, which were to supplant civil government unless and until they should adopt a constitution and the fourteenth amendment, also guarantee universal suffrage, the convention therefor to be elected by all men over 21—whether citizens or not—except the white citizens of the State, the election to be supervised by military officers and the registration to be conducted under military officers; the constitution so made to be submitted to the same illegal and farcical voters for ratification, then reported to Congress for approval; and then and not till then were the States to have Representatives in Congress. In passing, I may add, that same revolutionary Thirty-ninth Congress passed the revolutionary tenure of office act, upsetting the established practice since the foundation of the Government. It defied all restraints.

When the 10 States came with their new constitutions so unconstitutionally forced upon them this condition was imposed and nominally attached to their admission:

That the constitution of the State shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State.

That act was as sounding brass. Texas vs. White (7 Wallace) decides that the Confederate States were never out of the Union. So they could not be "conditionally readmitted."

Blaine says in that connection:

The Republican platform (1868) asserted that the guaranty of suffrage to the loyal men of the South must be maintained, but that the question of suffrage in the loyal States belonged to the States themselves. It was an evasion; a mere stroke of expediency to escape the prejudices which negro suffrage would encounter in a majority of the loyal States. It was a deception, because every intelligent man knew that it would be impossible to force negro suffrage on the Southern States by national authority and leave the Northern States free to exclude it from their own domain.

And that—

The Republican majority in Congress were so well satisfied that the war had not carried the 11 States out of the Union, that they insisted that the fourteenth amendment should be ratified by three-fourths of all the States.

Later on, while the civil rights bill was passing, on motion of Wilson of Iowa, this amendment was unanimously adopted:

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the laws of any State concerning the right of suffrage (p. 175).

Moreover, the same Congress which imposed negro suffrage as a condition for the alleged "readmission" of the Southern States, admitted Colorado and Nebraska, notwithstanding their constitutions prohibited negro suffrage.

While those frantic, and unfortunately successful, efforts were being made by Congress to fasten negro domination upon the South, States of the North serenely excluded the negro from suffrage: Connecticut in 1865, by 6,000 majority; Kansas in 1867, by 9,000; Minnesota, by 1,000; Ohio, by 50,000; New York, by 40,000. Nevada, Colorado, Nebraska, and Wisconsin swell the list.

The only criticism that can justly be made of us is that we so long endured the outrage perpetrated upon us and delayed resuming control of our governments by the intelligence and white manhood of the States, so forcibly and unconstitutionally wrested from them. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the charge of disfranchisement. I will simply say in addition, without going into details, that any man of ordinary intelligence in the South can qualify himself to vote, just as he can in Massachusetts or California.

The gentleman from Indiana seems very solicitous about the welfare of the negro in the South. I want to tell him and other members from the West that in New England and the Northern States, whose people have been brought into contact with the South by business intercourse and otherwise, there is an entirely different impression concerning the condition of the negro from that which prevails in some of the Western States. Out West people have the impression that the negro is oppressed, robbed, outrageously and brutally treated. The trouble is they do not know. They simply stay at home and do not enjoy proper facilities of business and other acquaintance with the South.

If they should once develop business relations with us; if they would send some of their men there and see what the existing conditions are; if they would see the amicable relations existing between the two races; if they would see how the South is prospering and taking the negro along up with it, they would have their eyes opened—the scales removed. There you have the great pension vote, and that vote is always cast against the South. Those voters still have the idea that they are emancipating the negro. It is, I imagine, a favorite pastime with you on the stump out West to abuse the South for her supposed treatment of the negro. Well, it does not hurt us. We are paying no attention to it; we are going ahead vigorously; we are devoting our time and attention to the development of our country, and astonishing the world by our tremendous advance in wealth and prosperity. You people out West who wish to abuse the South for political purposes may continue to do so to your hearts' content and make as many votes as you may by that proceeding. We shall not prevent it; we are too busy and life is too short.

A consideration more important than the control and elimination of the negro vote is, that the Southern people should enjoy security and peace and prosperity in their homes. We would not allow the suffrage question or anything else to stand in the way of the safety of our people and honest government. For eight long years we had a trial of negro domination under carpetbag leadership, and I want to give you some statistics of that reign of venality.

In South Carolina prior to 1868 the average tax collections amounted to $400,000 per annum. During those years of negro government the average was $1,270,000. There were fraudulently issued (and the proceeds converted to the personal use of those who had political control) bonds to the extent of $9,000,000. The State was robbed of that much money. The annual revenues were consumed in the bribery of members and senators, purchases for their use of furniture, supplies, and wine—keeping an open restaurant in the capitol day and night, and larceny by public officers. A public printing company was organized, composed of the clerk of the senate, the clerk of the house, and the comptroller-general. There was paid to this company for public printing during one year $450,000. Before that period the average was $21,000. The governor received $20,000 for his signature to one of the appropriation bills. The general assembly had 349 clerks, 124 pages, and 144 messengers. In one session there were issued in pay certificates $1,168,255.

These figures will give you an idea of what negro government (which you are contending for here) did for our State. One of the senators—Senator Leslie—said, "A State has no right to be a State unless she can pay and take care of her statesmen." That was the theory on which they acted. One of the United States Senators said that "there was in South Carolina five more years of good stealing." Out of 17 negro senators 14 were proven corrupt by an investigating commission.

Now, I want to tell you how the negro is treated in the North. Let me say to my friend from Indiana that one of the leading negroes of the South—Booker Washington—knows more about the negro than he does. What does Booker Washington say? I read from his remarks before the industrial convention:

It is in the South that the black man finds an open sesame in labor, industry, and business that is not surpassed anywhere. It is here that that form of slavery which prevents a man from selling his labor to whom he pleases, on account of his color, is almost unknown—that compels him to live in idleness while his family starves.

The South gives him something more merciful than sentiment—the opportunity to earn his bread. He can spend his dollar with fairest opportunity in the opera at the North; he can earn it with fairest opportunity at the South. He is excluded by the labor unions of the North.

That is what Booker Washington thinks about the negro in the South and in the North. Now, let me give you some facts in regard to our treatment of the negro in the South. The South evolved him from barbarism. It required slavery to do it. The North, aided by Europe, emancipated him; and now the South is bringing him up along with it. As the South grows industriously—as it grows in wealth and education—the negro is being carried along. He is not allowed to control the government, because he has been shown to be utterly unfit for it. He is protected in all his dearest rights except the right of voting, and he does not care to vote.

Why, sir, to-day every negro in South Carolina who can read and write may, if he chooses, go to one of the registration offices of the State and become a registered voter. Fifty thousand of them can do so if they wish. But you can not get them to do it. Why? Because they would rather save the dollar which would be required as poll tax. They know that they can not carry the elections. They know that nothing can be gained by their votes, except to fatten their leaders with Federal patronage. Nearly all of them belong to the "Emancipation party," and always will, I suppose. They know that the intelligence of the State is going to control. The know that if they vote the white people are going to stand together solidly, and I tell gentlemen on the other side that if there is anything in the world that is going to break up the solidity of the South it is what you term "depriving the negro of the right of suffrage."

For that reason I want a reasonable number of the negroes, short of a majority, to register. It is the best thing for South Carolina; it will be the best thing for the other Southern States, because there are, as all the newspapers show, signs of disintegration among the Democracy of the South. Various planks in the platform of the Republican party and other considerations are enticing Democrats away from the faith of generations, away from the political faith of their fathers. But they are not going to leave the Democratic party. Why? Because they recognize the force of the color menace. They know the salvation of their homes, the prosperity of their State, depends upon white domination, and they will surrender their national politics in order to secure white home government. My friend can not do the Democracy of the South a better service than he is doing to-day. I hope he will keep it up for at least ten years, to save us at least that long. [Laughter.]

The gentleman talks about education in the South. We are educating the negro. In South Carolina each year there is raised and applied for education, from various sources, an amount equal to 5 mills upon the assessed value of the property of the State; and there are more negroes than whites enrolled in the schools. During the past thirty years, according to Dr. Harris, Commissioner of Education, the South has spent more than $100,000,000 for the education of the negro, and he has not contributed 5 per cent of the amount.

Nowhere on earth is he so well or fairly treated as in the South, and I cheerfully do him the justice of saying that I do not believe that on the face of the earth can be found more faithful or satisfactory servants, domestics, and farm laborers, specially adapted as they are to certain sections of the South. He is all right in his place, and will continue to prosper and be contented with it. With us he gets work, protection, and justice; with you he gets nothing except his right to vote the "mancipation ticket," with never a piece of an office thrown in—your only use for him is his ballot.

Now, the plain answer to all these arguments is the way the South is growing. The South could not be making such tremendous progress and development as she is if the condition of disorder existed there as my friend would have this House believe. Our factories are rapidly growing, and not wholly by Northern capital. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] can tell you that. Of all the capital that is invested in the mills in my State, not 14 per cent of it is from the North. It is Southern capital, and evidences the progress and development of that country. I mention that particular industry because you are more familiar with its reputation than any other. We not only make the cotton, but we manufacture it and we export the manufactures. The South to-day exports over one-third of the total exports of this country, nearly $400,000,000 annually. We have got something else to do down there besides hunting negroes, much as the statement may surprise the gentleman.

Now, I will refer to some mistakes that the gentleman made about South Carolina. I am not going to enter into any extended argument. I deny the right of any member to bring my State upon this floor for trial—not that I am afraid to meet it, but it is beneath her dignity, and there should be no necessity for it. But I will answer some things that he refers to. He says:

> Other States than those mentioned have restrictive qualifications upon manhood suffrage, but they are of such a character and apply to such conditions that it can not be said that in any particular State they directly and necessarily disfranchise a sufficient number of citizens to materially affect the basis of representation.

Now, in Massachusetts in 1890, according to the census, there were 263,432 illiterate persons, who must be excluded from representation, according to my friend's position. In Connecticut there were 49,698. So the South is not the only country where that condition exists to an extent "to materially affect the basis of representation."

Now, here is what he says about lynchings in the South:

> The perpetrators of these crimes against civilization do not make the poor excuse that the penal machinery is inadequate, and the most appalling aspect of the situation is that in some of the most atrocious instances of mob execution the work is done in broad daylight, and no effort is made on the part of the perpetrators to conceal their identity. No prosecution ever follows.

He ought not to have brought Indiana into the question in this indirect way in the light of what has recently occurred at Rockport, where two negroes charged with murder were hunted down with bloodhounds and brutally lynched, and the third pursued to a neighboring town the day following and murdered in cold blood. How can he with any regard for the fair name of his State have the audacity to introduce such a subject upon this floor?

Mr. KLUTTZ. Three negroes lynched in two days!

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman believe that one-half of the Gulf of Mexico could be polluted and the other half remain pure?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just what we are talking about; we claim your half is just as rotten as ours.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. That is simply a side remark which the gentleman from Indiana has made. We say that there are more convictions of negroes in proportion to the number in the North than there are in the South, that in proportion to the respective populations there are more negroes to-day in the penitentiary in the North than there are in the penitentiary in the South. There the negro gets protection. Do not be afraid about that. We do not protect him in one crime; we never will. As long as he commits it he will be promptly lynched, certain, sure, just as he will be in any other section of the country. But when he commits other crimes he gets his trial by jury.

And, as if he were determined to show how utterly and monumentally ignorant he is concerning our conditions, he says:

> With their natural manufacturing resources and cheap, tractable labor, the field is peculiarly inviting to capital. The employer is free from the annoyances that labor organizations sometimes give in other sections, and with simplified machinery and the coercive force of penal laws, the negro becomes as efficient a factory hand in many lines as the white man. Capital will continue to be attracted by such favorable conditions, and the products of cheap, servile toil will continue to be sold in competition with the products of intelligent, independent labor in other sections of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as matters of fact, in all the Southland there are but two small cotton factories run with negro labor, and in my humble judgment and with my fervent hope both of them will soon cease the experiment. In none of them is there now or ever will be the joint service of both races. The white race would not permit it there any more than in the North. The negro can never become a competitor with our white people in the mills, for the simple reason that by nature he can at best make but a very inefficient operative, while, as I clearly established on this floor two years ago, there is no mill help in the world that can compare in character, intelligence, blood, and efficiency with that of the South, composed as it is of our own people, heirs of two centuries of Southern spirit, independence, intelligence, and love of country.

Nor is he any nearer the fact when he states that labor organizations are unknown to the operatives in the South, though he is undoubtedly correct in the collateral statement that negro labor is wholly unorganized. In no possible contingency will he ever be admitted into Southern labor organizations—the color line, to a dead certainty, will always be drawn in them. As yet the mill operatives have not, to any great extent, formed themselves into unions or organizations, but, of course, it is but a question of a few years at most when they will find it convenient and to their interests to do so—it has already begun—not because of any antagonism to capital or the mill managers and owners, for they now cooperate amicably, but for the same reason that has caused labor the civilized world over to organize—its own benefit and protection. No reasonable man will object to it, and no amount of unreasonable objection can avail against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, there are some very amusing features that have been presented by this debate. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], in support of the committee bill, took up the bill of the minority and showed very conclusively that it was framed upon entirely illogical, unfair, and uncertain mathematical computations, and then he blandly admitted that his bill was based upon precisely the same mathematical calculations. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], in support of the minority bill, took up that of the majority and satisfied everyone that an illogical, unfair, and unsafe basis had been adopted for the construction of that bill, and then admitted that the bill which he advocated was based upon precisely the same principles, excepting that he arbitrarily injected into the bill which he supported Representatives from three other States that were not warranted in any sense by the mathematical computation.

A great deal of time has been spent in trying to show the justice of the various bills. And yet every gentleman who stops to think about it knows that it is absolutely impossible for any man to have a scheme that will be absolutely just to the people of all the States. In the very nature of things it can not be done, and therefore it appears to me useless to waste time in these various comparisons. Take, for instance, the bill that has been lauded here by the minority of the committee as containing peculiarly the features of essential justice. Yet that very bill, notwithstanding their declarations that all major fractions are represented, leaves the State of Iowa with a majority fraction of 106,000 without the increase that should be given to a majority fraction.

How do you account for that, gentlemen? You get right up to the next number to that which would give Iowa this additional representation, and there you stop, yet you claim great virtue for yourselves because of the exact justice that is manifested by your bill. The truth is, gentlemen, you can not any of you be just. You can not divide by any divisor so as to give to every man exact representation in this House, and therefore we might as well discard that. Why should you insist about majority fractions? Suppose that the divisor is 200,000, and here is a major fraction of 100,001, which has representation. Here is another fraction, that is not a majority fraction, of 100,000. You deny representation to that, and yet it may be a babe 6 months old that constitutes the major fraction. You might suggest that you are giving representation in this House to that baby.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the whole question involved here is one of expediency. What is the better size? What number of Representatives can best perform the duties that devolve upon them in a deliberative body? Not this body, for I am willing to confess here that it presents none of the features of a deliberative body [laughter], but that deliberative body that we ought to have. The fathers gave us their opinion with regard to this matter. When they provided for 26 Senators they provided for 65 Representatives. That was their idea. They thought that the political power of a member of the Senate should be two and a half times greater than the political power of a Representative.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I would ask the gentleman what was the proportion in the last census?

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience he will find that I am talking about what the fathers did, and the fathers did nothing with regard to the Eleventh Census, so far as I am advised. [Laughter.]

That was their idea. How is it in the different States? In the State where I live there are 50 senators and 100 representatives. In the State of Illinois, I believe, there are three representatives to one senator.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Fewer than that in Ohio.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that in the majority of the States the proportion is less than three to one. There is a consensus of opinion, at least in some degree, that might enlighten us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of Representatives here to preserve the political power with which they are invested as compared with Senators. Senators have on a number of occasions increased the number of Representatives, or it has been done in the Senate. You have noticed, undoubtedly, that we have been favored with the presence of Senators during the discussion of this bill as we are not on other occasions favored. A great interest, newspapers inform us, is being taken by those of a certain character, attempting to influence this House in the direction of an enlargement of its membership. Why? Because the larger this House becomes the greater proportionate power does the Senator retain as compared with the Representative. It is too much now, and yet the House is all the time consenting to augment it.

Why should we, where it is unnecessary, constantly insist that the appointing power should be limited to control by the Senate? Why should all the inferior Federal officers hold their induction into office because of the advice and consent of the Senate? We are constantly augmenting the power of Senators, while they are constantly curtailing ours. It is unwise. I think there is something in this for consideration. Gentlemen tell us now, who are advocates for enlarging this House, on other occasions that the fact of an enlarged House justifies a system of government in the House that is destructive to the individuality of members, and absolutely destructive of the representative power that the Constitution gives us and that our people fondly think we enjoy.

When you attack the system of rules that we have, that is vicious in every degree, that is harmful to the individual character of the member, that is harmful to the deliberative character of this body, that absolutely destroys it, and puts it beyond the power of any individual to participate in legislation or to bring to the consideration of this House any measure, no matter how important it may be to him or to his people, without he gets the consent of another person, another Representative—when you attack that vicious system, you are told that it is because the House is a mob, because it has been so enlarged that individual responsibility does not weigh upon the members; because there is no possibility in the confusion of the vast number to secure that deliberation that is necessary to the proper discharge of public business. On those occasions the House is too large. I believe it is wiser, I believe it would be better for the people, and it would be better for the individual membership, to decrease rather than increase the number of Representatives.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he would vote for an amendment to the Hopkins bill fixing the number at 350 instead of 357, and thereby reduce the representation of Iowa from 11 to 10?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; I would not do that. But I will say this, if the committee in its wisdom, after an examination of the whole subject, had introduced a bill of that character, I would have supported it. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any corresponding good will come to us by this enlargement. Let me remind the gentleman from Virginia that the time once was when the State of Virginia had 24 Representatives in this House. In my judgment——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman what census that was.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have forgotten; the number was between 22 and 24.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Twenty-three was the highest number of Representatives that Virginia ever had.

Mr. HEPBURN. I came within one of it. [Laughter.] I take it that every argument that could be made to-day for increasing the Representatives of this House so that Virginia shall continue the Representatives that she now has could have been made at the time when she had 23. Suppose that that argument had been effective, and suppose at each recurring period when it was made it had influence, what would have been the number now? More than 800 members would have seats upon this floor. There was a time when the State of Maine had 8 members.

When it was proposed to diminish that number, I have no doubt but that there was some eloquent son of Maine who made substantially the same argument that was made here the other day; and yet if that argument had been potential, if that number had been continued up to the present time, and other States had the representation that they would have had, to-day there would be 771 members entitled to seats upon this floor. And has Maine suffered? Certainly not. As the people have learned from time to time, when they must lose in quantity they have so improved the quality that Maine certainly to-day has no cause to blush for her representation on this floor.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit a question in that line?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, if the gentleman desires to ask me if I want to say the same thing for Virginia, I will say, unhesitatingly, "yes." [Great laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman if this apportionment had taken place two years ago instead of now—when Mr. Reed was Speaker and Mr. Dingley the leader of the majority—if he thinks such a bill as this would ever have been reported here?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I remember well the potency of the Speaker. [Laughter.] I remember that a particular individual at the time mentioned had his great power as an individual reenforced by the surrender of my power and that of every other member of this House into his hands. Whether he could have controlled the committee I do not know, but I am inclined to doubt it.

Mr. Speaker, I want this House to have the largest number of persons that it can to discharge the business that it has to transact; but I do not want its number to be so augmented as will furnish an argument for the binding of the hands of the individual members of the House. And I know, and every one of you know, that it will be urged, and that it will have its effect upon certain members who have to vote upon a question of the rules before they have had an opportunity to chafe under the restraints and tyrannies of those rules.

And I know that when the placid gentleman now occupying the chair, the leader upon this side, my venerable friend on my right, and a corresponding number of gentlemen occupying corresponding positions on that side of the House, in the early days of the session, when the neophyte is here and has not been hazed [laughter], he sees them standing up as advocates of a retention of the rules without change, he naturally says to himself, "This must be all right, or such leaders, who have the confidence of the American people, would not be their advocates," forgetting, or never knowing in his innocence, that these gentlemen belong to the charmed circle [laughter]; that these gentlemen, because of their great eminence, because of their marked and recognized superiority, have a power in this House that is above rule, or that compels the amelioration of the rule in their behalf whenever they propose to invoke it.

Mr. Speaker, I heard a gentleman in this debate, in support of this enlarged number, say that this House could do whatever it chose. I want to deny that statement. I make the assertion here that there is no proposition that affects the people of my State or of any one of the States that an individual member can secure even consideration of without he first addresses himself to another Representative and gets the consent of that Representative. [Applause.] I remember of hearing my friend on my right once say that under the rules of this House the House could do whatever it chose. I would yield to him a moment for the purpose of asking him if, after reflection, he would contradict the statement that I have here so deliberately made?

Mr. GROSVENOR. After the very high compliment that the gentleman from Iowa has seen fit to bestow on me I would not contradict anything that he would say. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Thank you. I now appreciate the value of compliments, and I shall henceforth use them in the place of arguments. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, the statement that I have made is a grave one. It ought not to be made without deliberation. I ought not to say to the American people that the whole scheme and plan of the Constitution with regard to this House of Representatives is subverted, destroyed, annihilated by the rules of this House without it was true. And I will ask any gentleman, and I will yield to him if he will undertake to tell us, how any proposition can be brought before this House without it receives the assent of the Speaker of the House. And even then, with reference to a great majority of propositions, how can it be brought to the House after it once has gone into the bosom of a committee and that committee does not see fit to report it?

Every member upon this floor, 356 of us, may be anxious for the adoption of a proposition, and it can not be brought to the consideration of the House by any possible means known to the law without the consent of that gentleman into whose hands you and I have surrendered the political power of our constituents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the excuse for this? Mind you, I am not criticising the old Speakers or the new. I have no complaint to make of the manner in which they administer their power. I am quarreling with ourselves, and we will be asked to continue this robbery of ourselves, this wrong to our constituents, this surrender of their political power—for it is theirs, gentlemen, and not yours or mine—we will be asked to continue this. Why? Because the House is so large, because it is so unwieldy, because the confusion is so great, that business can not be transacted without it. Therefore from time to time the surrender is made.

I want that we shall act on this bill so that we will not give added force to declarations that are made in that behalf in the near future. I think that even with the number that we have there is confusion. My friend called attention to it to-day when the important matter was being settled as to when we should reach a vote upon this question. Time and again the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was compelled to rise in his place and insist that although important business was being transacted publicly here upon the floor he could not hear a word that was said. He could not tell whether to object or not, and the efforts which the Speaker vigorously exerted time and again were necessary in order to get that slight measure of order that would permit even the gentleman seated where he is to hear what was going on in the House. I do not want this number to be enlarged. I do not believe there is wisdom in the enlargement.

This bill, as it is presented by the committee, seeks no political advantage—none. It is fair, I think, on that question. We would gain, as Republicans, something under the bill proposed by the minority, but if we are going after things political, I am not content with that. I want to go further. I want to increase the membership just 12 more—only 12, gentlemen, only 12. [Laughter.] As one gentleman said a little while ago, "Twenty-nine will make no appreciable difference in the manner of conducting the business in the House." And if it will not, then the House with the addition of 12 more—only 12—will not make any appreciable difference in the transactions of the business of the House, and it will give to the poor, defenseless Republican majority here an advantage of 15. I take it, in some future House; and if we are going after political advantages, I want to go for the largest number. That is the largest number we can possibly secure in any of the propositions that are made between 350 and 400, and if we are to be moved by political considerations, I want to tell you, gentlemen, my lofty soul can not be moved by a paltry 7. [Laughter.] I want 15. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, we certainly have been much interested and instructed by the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]; but if we did not know that the bill under consideration was one to apportion Representatives, we would think that he had been discussing a proposed amendment to the rules of the House.

I have listened before to the gentleman's criticisms on our rules. I listened to his great speech at the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress, when I first became a member of the House. I realized then his power as a speaker, and the justness of some of his criticisms, but I remember that the rules were adopted in that Congress notwithstanding his objections.

I was not in the Fifty-fifth Congress, but the RECORD shows that he made the same criticisms then. He omitted to make objection, for some reason, at the time of the adoption of the rules of the House in the present Congress, but makes his criticisms to-day instead. I remind the gentleman of the fact that the rules of the House under which we are now proceeding were adopted first in the Fifty-first Congress, when the membership of the House was 325 instead of 357; and I would like to know whether these rules are any more objectionable in a House of 357 than they were in a House of 325. The gentleman's objection is to our rules and our procedure under them, not to the size of the House.

I speak to-day in favor of the proposition for a larger House. I speak in favor of the proposition for a House that will recognize the increase of population in this country in the last ten years. I am in favor of a House that will follow the precedents of half a century by an increase in membership to keep pace with the increase in population. I am not willing to go back to the apportionment act of 1850 as a guide for my footsteps, even though it is indorsed by the gentleman from Iowa.

But while I differ from him in regard to the size of the House, I agree with him that it is impossible under the Constitution to do equal and exact justice to all the States in an apportionment bill. The members of this House were certainly convinced of that fact by the criticism which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] made on the bill of the minority, that it did injustice to certain States; and they also realized from the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] that the bill of the majority did injustice to some of the States.

The statements of these two gentlemen are absolutely correct and show the impossibility of enacting a law that will exactly apportion Representatives among the several States.

The Constitution provides that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. Direct taxes can be exactly so apportioned. When the amount of the tax is determined it can be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers, for the reason that a dollar can be divided into 100 parts, and those parts, by the use of fractions, can be still further divided, so there is no difficulty about the apportionment of direct taxes to an absolute certainty.

But when we come to the apportionment of Representatives, and assume a certain number as the size of the House, a difficulty arises from the fact that the population of the different States varies, and it is impossible to divide a Representative. If the population of each State could be accurately and equally divided by any ratio and no remainder left, then Representatives could be apportioned with the same accuracy and equality as direct taxes. But this can not be done, and so from the organization of the Government up to this time, every ten years when an apportionment bill is up for consideration, this question has been debated and discussed and has been the cause of as much argument and controversy as any nonpolitical question that has arisen in Congress. It has attracted the attention of the best minds of the century.

From the time that George Washington vetoed the first apportionment bill, after full consultation with his Cabinet that included Hamilton and Jefferson, down through the century, we find that Madison, Webster, Clay, Trumbull, Conkling, Edmunds, Garfield, and many other statesmen of the country have given their best thought to this question of making the apportionment of Representatives as nearly fair and equitable as is possible under the circumstances.

THE BILLS OF THE MAJORITY AND MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE.

I call attention to the fact that the bill of the majority, on a computation of 357 members, gives on even division 335, while there are 4,595,126 persons who are unrepresented after that division. What does the bill of the majority do? It gives representation to the four States of Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming. It is compelled to do that under the provision of the Constitution which requires that each State shall have at least one Representative. Then it takes 18 of the largest fractions in the different States and accords Representatives on those fractions. Then the majority, in effect, say:

We can go no further. Our process uses fractions until we reach 357 only, and we are compelled to leave 23 States with fractions aggregating 1,384,468 without any representation on those fractions.

What does the bill of the minority do? On even division, on a computation of 384, it secures 360. Then, after giving those 4 States Representatives, which it is compelled to do under the Constitution, it takes 22 other States with major fractions and accords them Representatives on their fractions, and then the minority say, "We are unable to accord representation to 1,031,056 persons in the United States." In their bill they accord representation to 253,712 more persons in the different States than the bill of the majority, and, in my opinion, that is getting nearer to exact justice, nearer to equity and the rights of all the States than does the bill of the majority. Now, what is the difference between the two methods? In what respect do they differ in their plan of operation?

Mr. HEPBURN. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman, under his ratio—under the table 384—after making the divisions and aggregating the remainder, does he not have a larger number unrepresented than under the table of 357?

Mr. LONG. We do not. The difference is 253,712 in favor of our proposition. We give representation to that many more people.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him, under the table of 357 the remainder is 4,595,126. Under the table of 384 the remainder is 4,660,386.

Mr. LONG. If my friend from Iowa will remember, I have just given those figures; but the bill of the majority accords Representatives to fractions, until the remainder, 4,595,126, is reduced to 1,384,468.

Mr. HEPBURN. Those are minority fractions, are they not?

Mr. LONG. No; they are only minor fractions in Nevada and Wyoming which, under the Constitution, receive one Representative each. There are major fractions in all other cases. The bill of the minority accords Representatives on fractions and reduces the remainder, 4,460,386, to 1,031,056. This bill reduces it 253,712 more than the majority bill does. The unrepresented population in the United States is 253,712 fewer under the minority bill than under that of the majority, and I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether that is not nearer to exact justice in an apportionment than the bill of the majority?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think it makes any difference one way or the other as a matter of justice.

Mr. LONG. That is the difference between the gentleman and myself. I think Congress under the Constitution should adopt such method or methods, such process or processes, that will give representation to as many people in the different States as possible and leave as few people in the different States unrepresented as possible.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then, let me ask the gentleman why he does not go still further, so that his divisor will be a less number? The smaller the divisor the more certainty there is of having exact and equal justice in the distribution of power. Why not go to 400 as the total membership of the House?

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman present an amendment for 400?

Mr. HEPBURN. You are talking about what ought to be done.

Mr. LONG. Is the gentleman ready to propose such an amendment?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly not.

Mr. LONG. If he will propose it, I will support it.

Mr. HEPBURN. But in your anxiety about doing exact justice why do you not go still further?

Mr. LONG. In the minority bill we have recognized the increased population in the country since the last census, as I will show before I conclude, and we have enlarged the House, following the precedents of prior apportionments. We have made no greater increase than was made in the apportionment of 1882 and in that of 1891.

THE DIFFERENCE IN METHODS BETWEEN THE BILLS.

The difference between the two bills is this: The gentleman from Illinois—and I would like to have the attention of my genial friend from that State—the gentleman from Illinois takes 357 as the fixed number. He divides the constitutional population of all the States by that. He gets the ratio in that manner. Then he divides the population of the different States by that divisor and obtains a certain number on even division, and that number is 335.

He has a number of fractions left over in the different States. He accords representation to the 4 States of Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming, as he is compelled to do under the constitutional provision that each State must have at least 1 Representative, and then to the 18 States having the largest fractions he accords Representatives. When he reaches the number 357 he says, "Even though I have done injustice to Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota in not giving them representation on their major fractions, yet I am compelled to refrain from doing so because my process will not admit of it."

The minority of the committee believe with him that there should be a certain assumed number as the size of the House, but they differ from him in this, that they do not believe that that number should be absolutely fixed and invariable. They believe that it is just and right to vary from that number whenever it is necessary to give representation to major fractions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will it trouble the gentleman if I interrupt him?

Mr. LONG. Not at all.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman at all. On that principle, if you wanted to carry that on so as to take care of every major fraction, is it not a fact that you can not stop short of 395?

Mr. LONG. It is a fact under your process.

Mr. HOPKINS. We will not call it anybody's process, but under the figures presented by the Director of the Census, and under which, it is claimed by the minority of the committee, the bill is in part framed, is it not a fact that in order to have all the major fractions cared for you can not stop short of 395, with a ratio of 188,774?

Mr. LONG. It is a fact that you can stop anywhere you want to stop. You can assume any number you want to assume in the first instance, and then, in making your division, do it with the understanding all the time that you are not bound to the original assumed number, but that you must go on and give representation to the major fractions until you give representation to every major fraction that exists.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, if my friend will allow me, under the bill that is advocated by the gentleman, with the number that they propose to fix as the membership of the House, there are major fractions in both the States of New York and Pennsylvania, and if you include those States it will keep you on until your each the number 395, at which number you dispose of all of the major fractions and allow each State representation.

Mr. LONG. I want the gentleman's attention once more, and I hope that he will be fair on this question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, certainly.

Mr. LONG. The computation is made on the Table 384; but on that computation 2 States, and 2 States only, have major fractions unrepresented—the States of Virginia and Nebraska. When you take the Table 386 and attempt to give representation to every major fraction on that table you find that you have 6 States with major fractions—Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, and Ohio. That is when you take 386; but when you take 384 you only have 2 States under the table without representation on major fractions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, right there. When you take 386, then there are 6 States instead of 2 that have major fractions.

Mr. LONG. That is right; that is, when you make the computation on 386.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then you keep on increasing in order to dispose of the major fractions until you get to 395, and at 395 no State loses anything and every State is treated exactly alike.

Mr. LONG. I do not admit that it is nece sary to go to 395. I hope the gentleman will understand that. He is wedded to a particular process that recognizes only a sufficient number of fractions to reach the original number. This House, in my opinion, is not tied to that particular process.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman unnecessarily, but I wish to say this: I have never contended that the House did not have the right to do whatever it chose. My proposition has been that if you take a process in order to determine the membership of the House, science and mathematics require you to follow it out and to treat every State alike under that process.

Mr. LONG. I want to call the attention of the gentleman again to the fact that we do not believe in following his process without any variations.

Mr. HOPKINS. No; but the gentleman must bear in mind that in mathematics you have got to follow out a proposition to its logical result. You can not take 384 and give representation to part of the States, and then adopt some other process, because that is not treating the States fairly. Either you must take the process and follow it through to its logical, legitimate, and mathematical result, or you must abandon it entirely and then make up your representation on some system of your own.

Mr. LONG. Not at all. The gentleman speaks of doing injustice to States. I have admitted that this process of yours and the plan under which the minority are operating will result in injustice to some States. If that was not the situation we would not be discussing this bill here to-day.

THE WEBSTER REPORT OF 1832.

I now call the gentleman's attention to the controversy that we had the other day, when, during the course of his remarks, he claimed that he was acting under the plan laid down by Mr. Webster, and he said that Mr. Webster in the Senate amendment adopted a certain number, and that by according Representatives to all major fractions he reached the original number that he had assumed in the first instance. I want to call his attention to the fact that he has made a misstatement in that respect and has attempted to mislead the House.

This question has been the subject of great and extended discussion, simply on account of the fractions that remained after dividing the population of the different States by the ratio that was either assumed or found on some preliminary basis.

From the first apportionment down to 1832 fractions in every instance were disregarded, and no representation was given on them. In 1832 the House again passed a bill denying representation on fractions. It reached the Senate and, after some consideration, was referred to a committee, of which Mr. Webster was chairman. A report was made on the bill in which the whole question was fully discussed. Like every other question to which that great constitutional lawyer and statesman directed his attention, he proceeded to illumine the whole subject, and his report has formed the basis of much of the discussion on this question since that time.

In the first place, in this report Mr. Webster lays down the doctrine of the inability to do equal and exact justice to all. He states that it is impossible to make an apportionment that is exactly just and equitable to all States; and he says that part of the Constitution which requires us to apportion members among the several States according to their respective numbers means as near as may be; and that is what we are endeavoring to do. And he further laid down this proposition:

The next thing to be observed is that the Constitution prescribes no particular process by which this apportionment is to be wrought out. It has plainly described the end to be accomplished, viz, the nearest approach to relative equality of representation among the States; and whatever accomplishes this end, and nothing else, is the true process.

Further on he says that—

It may be necessary to employ several processes in order to accomplish the nearest approach to exact justice among the different States.

There is one proposition that Mr. Webster lays down that I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, and that is the one we are contending for; and it runs through an entire political system. When we apportion delegates in our political conventions in the different States we accord representation for so many votes cast for a certain candidate in a previous election in the township or county, and one for every major fraction. All over the country representation in State and district conventions is given to major fractions, and I insist that we should recognize this principle in the passage of this bill, as it always has been done, with the exception of the act of 1850.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now will the gentleman allow me, right there?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. In your bill as you report it are there not States with major fractions that are unrepresented?

Mr. LONG. There are not.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman know that in the State of Pennsylvania, under the minority bill, there is a major fraction of 120,515 that is unrepresented under that bill?

Mr. LONG. The State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. The State of Pennsylvania has a fraction of 88,291, which is not a major fraction.

Mr. HOPKINS. On what membership?

Mr. LONG. On a computation of 384.

Mr. HOPKINS. Three hundred and eighty-four. Is your bill predicated on a membership of this House of 384 or 386?

Mr. LONG. Our proposition is——

Mr. HOPKINS. Answer my question.

Mr. LONG. I will answer it. We finally make a House of 386.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, with 386, the tables show that there are 120,515 people in Pennsylvania that are unrepresented.

Mr. LONG. We are bound by the Constitution and not by the gentleman's tables.

Mr. THROPP. Will the gentleman permit me an inquiry?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THROPP. With reference to the fraction of which the gentleman from Illinois has spoken. If you make your bill 388, which is 2 more, Pennsylvania will have 33 members, an increase of 3 members instead of an increase of 2 members, as she has under the Burleigh bill. Further than that, if the gentleman wishes to reach the right conclusion, the only one that is right, as he says they wish to, and therefore he claims he presents the better method, he can reduce the total minorities from 1,300,000 to 1,000,000, and by making this House 395 members every State with a major fraction will be taken care of and 13 minority fractions will remain, and this will leave only 419,017 unrepresented.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania present such an amendment?

Mr. THROPP. I will.

Mr. LONG. Has it the support of the Pennsylvania delegation?

Mr. THROPP. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. LONG. I wish the gentleman would ascertain.

Mr. THROPP. I only bring up the question now, so that the gentleman can consider it.

Mr. LONG. I understand we can assume any number in the first place as the size of the House. That is recognized in this report. That is the basis and has been the basis of all apportionments, but we are not bound to work out a House and stop at that assumed number. That is the principle we assert. I want now to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. HOPKINS. You have it all the time.

Mr. LONG (continuing). To what this report says in regard to major fractions:

If the view thus taken of the rights of the States and the duties of Congress be the correct view, then the plan proposed in the amendment is in no just sense a representation of fractions. But suppose it was otherwise; suppose a direct provision were made for allowing a Representative to every State in whose population, it being first divided by a common ratio, there should be found a fraction exceeding half the amount of that ratio, what constitutional objection could be fairly urged against such a provision? Let it be always remembered that the case here supposed provides only for a fraction exceeding the moiety of the ratio; for the committee admit at once that the representation of fractions less than a moiety is unconstitutional, because, should a member be allowed to a State for such a fraction, it would be certain that her representation would not be so near her exact right as it was before.

But the allowance of a member for a major fraction is a direct approximation toward justice and equality. There appears to the committee to be nothing either in the letter or the spirit of the Constitution opposed to such a mode of apportionment. On the contrary, it seems entirely consistent with the very object which the Constitution contemplated and well calculated to accomplish it. The argument commonly urged against it is that it is necessary to apply some one common divisor and to abide by its results.

And further on in the report the rule is stated to be this:

Let the rule be that the whole number of the proposed House shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, giving to each State that number of members which come nearest to her exact mathematical part or proportion; or, let the rule be that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that, in addition to the number of members resulting from such division, a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of the divisor.

Unless, says the gentleman from Illinois, you reach the original number that you started with, and if you do, you must stop short, and go no further. What does Webster say?

It is true that there may be some numbers assumed for the composition of the House of Representatives, to which, if the rule were applied, the result might give a member to the House more than was proposed.

The same as it does in the minority bill. The same as it does under the majority bill. What then?

But it will be always easy to correct this by altering the proposed number, by adding one to it or taking one from it; so that this can be considered no objection to the rule.

What does the gentleman from Illinois say? "Stop! You must not go any further than the number assumed in the first instance."

Now, what were the facts as to this amendment in the Senate, the gentleman from Illinois to the contrary notwithstanding? In the amendment reported, the size of the House was in blank and the apportionment to the different States was in blank. Mr. Webster demanded a vote on the principle whether or not fractions should be given representation, and the vote of the Senate was a tie, 22 to 22, and the Vice-President cast his vote in favor of the Webster proposition, and the principle was indorsed by the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman indorse all that Mr. Webster says in that report?

Mr. LONG. I do not know whether I indorse all that he says or not. I have found nothing yet that I do not indorse, but there may be some things in it upon which I might take the gentleman from Illinois rather than Mr. Webster. [Laughter.] But on this proposition, and what this particular amendment was, I would rather take Mr. Webster.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to read a line or two from Mr. Webster's report?

Mr. LONG. If it is not too long.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is only a line or two.

It is enough that the State presents her own representation on the floor of Congress in the mode she chooses to present it. If the State were to give one portion of her territory a Representative for 25,000 persons, and to the rest a Representative only for 50,000, it would be an act of unjust legislation, doubtless, but it would be wholly beyond the redress of any power of Congress, because the Constitution has left all this to the State itself.

Does the gentleman from Kansas approve of that?

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. All right.

Mr. LONG (continuing). The minority and the majority bills to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, you are prepared to take anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. The principle being indorsed by the Senate, what happened? Two hundred and fifty-six was proposed in the Senate and voted down. Two hundred and fifty-one was proposed and accepted, and that was the Senate amendment; and if the gentleman from Illinois had read the report that he said he had in his desk, he would have learned the way and manner in which the Senate arrived at the number 251. The number assumed was 250, and then they accorded a Representative to every major fraction, and that increased the House to 251, the same as by assuming 384, as is done in the minority bill, and according representation to every major fraction you make a House of 386. When this amendment came back to the House it was referred to a committee of which Mr. James K. Polk, afterwards President of the United States, was chairman, and he made a report against recognizing fractions at all. Mr. Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, presented a minority report. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the statement made in that minority report:

But while the minority of the committee are decidedly of opinion that the laws of equity and the fair interpretation of the Constitution require an apportionment on the principles of the amendment of the Senate, they recommend to the House to adopt a different number, viz, 256. This number has the advantage of retaining to each State its present representation in Congress—an advantage not possessed by the number 251. It is an additional recommendation of the number 256 that it is the exact mathematical result of the rule of proportion, applied according to the principles maintained in the foregoing statement. In apportioning a House of 250, the result is a House of 251—and if 251 be the number assumed the aggregate result would be 252. Although in practice there is no inconvenience in this result and the principle of the nearest possible approach to exact mathematical proportion remains unimpaired, the number 256 has the advantage of being free from this real or supposed objection. The minority of the committee accordingly recommend an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, in virtue of which the House will consist of 256 members, distributed in such a manner that each State will have that number assigned it which comes the nearest possible to the exact proportion which the population of the State bears to the Union.

And that is what the Senate did—

That is what the minority of that committee, through Edward Everett, said; and if the Senate had adopted 256, the gentleman would be right in his assumption that they utilized all the major fractions and reached only their original number. But the number which the Senate adopted being 251, he was incorrect in his statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has been kind enough to refer to the minority report in that case. Does he not know that the majority report, presented by Mr. Polk (subsequently President of the United States), said that—

The amendment fixed the number of Representatives in this House at 251 members; and it is to be observed that there is no ratio or common divisor that can be selected which will equally apply to the separate population of the States?

So that the controversy between the House and the Senate was not so much as to whether every majority fraction should be represented as it was whether any fractions at all should be represented. Up to that time, from the foundation of the Government, fractions had been disregarded in all apportionments. The House prepared a bill on that basis and sent it to the Senate; and the Senate, under the leadership of Mr. Webster, found the inequalities such that they adopted a new ratio to take care of major fractions. They prepared a bill for 251 Representatives, which took care of the major fractions.

Mr. LONG. They did not prepare a bill which assumed 251 in the first instance as the number. Their amendment assumed 250 as the number; and if the gentleman wants any more evidence on that point, I will call his attention to the statement of Senator Dickerson as to how that number was obtained.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not care how it originated. My proposition is this: The Senate struck out all of the House bill and sent back to the House a bill providing for a membership of 251, which membership took care of the major fractions.

Mr. LONG. How did they reach that number?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is immaterial for the purposes of this argument.

Mr. LONG. It is not. That is the difference here between the majority and minority bills. The gentleman says that because we exceed the number that we first assumed we are violating the Constitution and all the rules of mathematical certainty. We say no.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman knows that by taking 251 as the number they took care of every major fraction. Did they not?

Mr. LONG. They in the first instance took 250, and then, taking care of every major fraction, they reached a House of 251. Now let me read Senator Dickerson's statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the gentleman does that, let me say this: When the Senate got through with the process which the gentleman has been talking about, they had a membership of 251, and every major fraction was taken care of, was it not?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, the difference between that proceeding and the proceeding adopted in your bill is this: You have deliberately taken 384, as you say, and then added 2.

Mr. LONG. We add 2 for the major fractions.

Mr. HOPKINS. But when you get 386, you leave out two States with major fractions, which the Senate did not do in the case we are arguing.

Mr. LONG. Which the Senate did do.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; the Senate took care of all major fractions.

Mr. LONG. All major fractions on their computation, not on a computation upon some other divisor. Here is what Senator Dickerson said as to the basis of the calculation:

The basis of the calculation was for a House of 250.

Does the gentleman understand that?

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that fully.

Mr. LONG. Two hundred and fifty, not 251.

By applying a common divisor and rejecting the fractions the House was reduced to 240. These were the Representatives belonging to the aggregate fractions; those, being given to the States having the highest fractions, would make a House of 250, according to the original basis of the calculation. As, however, Alabama had a fraction less than those of ten other States, but still more than a moiety of the common divisor, and as this State is a new and rapidly growing State and possessing, without doubt, at this time a population sufficient to give her another Representative, it was thought but equitable that she should have such Representative.

The House refused to adopt the amendment of the Senate. The Senate finally receded, and the bill was passed without recognizing any fractions in the apportionment.

It will thus be observed from the reading of this report and the proceedings under it that Mr. Webster believed that it was right to assume a certain number as the size of the House; that the constitutional population of all the States should be divided by it, and the result thus obtained should be used as a divisor to divide the population of each State; that in addition to the result obtained by dividing the population of each State by this common divisor, every major fraction should be accorded a Representative, and that this number should be added to the number obtained on even division, even though the number finally reached was greater than the one assumed in the first instance.

That is the way they reached 251—by recognizing all States with major fractions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman state to the House——

Mr. LONG. I will have to ask the gentleman to desist If he has any further questions——

Mr. HOPKINS. The only point I was going to inquire about——

Mr. LONG. I ask the gentleman to remember that my time is limited.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will not occupy the gentleman's time further.

THE APPORTIONMENT OF 1842.

Mr. LONG. The arguments made in the report of Mr. Webster left their impress upon Congress and the country, and the result was that when the next apportionment was made in 1842, for the first time in our history, major fractions were recognized and accorded representation. The act of June 25, 1842, recites the ratio of representation and then says each State shall have Representatives equal to the number obtained by dividing the population of each State by such ratio and then says:

And of one additional Representative for each State having a fraction greater than one moiety of the said ratio, computed according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

The bill of the minority does that. The bill of the majority excludes three States, Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota, which have major fractions.

THE APPORTIONMENT ACT OF 1850.

When we come to the act of May 23, 1850, we find for the first time this ironclad, unyielding process followed by the gentleman from Illinois. Two things were attempted to be done by that act, both of which have failed in every apportionment since and will fail this time unless the gentleman from Illinois secures the passage of the bill of the majority and its enactment into law. The first was that the Congress of 1850 said that this House had become large enough; that it never should be any larger; that there should be no attempt to keep pace with the increase of population; that the membership of this House should be fixed for all future time at 233, and in order to avoid the temptation of adding to the number or interfering with it they imposed upon the Secretary of the Interior the duty of making the apportionment under the process.

The act instructs him to divide the population of the United States by 233; that the result should be the ratio of apportionment of Representatives, and that he should divide the population of each State by this ratio and that the product of this last division should be the number of Representatives apportioned to such State; that the loss in the number of Representatives caused by the fractions remaining in the several States on the division of the population should be compensated for by assigning to so many States having the largest fractions an additional member each for its fraction as may be necessary to make the whole number of Representatives 233. There is the beginning of the process to which the gentleman from Illinois is wedded and which he declines to vary in any particular, except that he assumes the number 357 instead of 233.

It will be observed that this process differs from that laid down by Mr. Webster in this: It makes no distinction between major and minor fractions; it only takes a sufficient number of fractions, having regard to their size, beginning with the highest, which may be necessary, to reach the original number fixed as the size of the House.

This method was known for years as the Vinton method, named after the gentleman who originated it. It was followed in the apportionment of 1852 with no variations, but it has never been followed since, for by following it major fractions would not be accorded representation.

THE APPORTIONMENT OF 1862.

In the apportionment of 1862 the Secretary of the Interior apportioned a House of 233 under the law, and submitted his report to Congress. The House at that time consisted of 239 members, by reason of the admission of new States, and promptly passed a bill providing for 6 additional members, so that the size of the House would not be decreased.

The bill went to the Senate and was considered there. I want to call attention of the gentleman from Illinois and the House to the remarks of Mr. Collamer, of Vermont. He tells how it was amended. He says:

Take the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, that they should have their number 239, and then take the census of 1860 and divide the representative population by 239, as their bill proposes; that will ascertain your fractions.

Then go onand give Representatives to every State, according to that representative ratio produced by that result, and then give to each State having the fractions, if by giving them you will make them nearer to the ratio than they would be by withholding them, and it will give to just those States which I have enumerated in my amendment, taking from none.

That made a House of 241, or 233 as apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior and 8 additional as apportioned by the act, and it was obtained just as the minority have obtained the number 386 in this case, by taking 239, dividing the population of all the States, obtaining the ratio, dividing the population of each State by it, recognizing all major fractions, and reaching a House of 241. The House concurred in the amendment and it became a law.

THE APPORTIONMENT OF 1872.

The apportionment of 1872 under the Ninth Census was first made on the basis of a House of 283 members. It was James A. Garfield's amendment in the House that finally was adopted and incorporated into the bill. A determined effort was made to retain the House at 243, it having increased to that size during the preceding decade by the admission of the States of Nevada and Nebraska. The attempt was a failure, and the bill provided for an increase of 40 in the House. The act gave representation to all major fractions.

Scarcely had the bill become a law when it was realized that an injustice had been done the States of New Hampshire and Vermont. By increasing the House to 283 all other States had saved the representation that they had at that time except the States of New Hampshire and Vermont. A supplemental bill was introduced in the House and passed with but very little opposition, the report of the committee containing this statement:

The recent action of Congress in increasing the size of the House to 283, in order to save 8 States from a diminution in the number of their Representatives, has inclined the committee to recommend a further increase of 9 members, making the whole number 292, which is believed to be the smallest number that upon an equitable and constitutional apportionment will leave each State with at least its present representation.

The committee adopted the method followed by the minority of our committee, on the basis of an apportionment of 290 members. It is shown in the report that 278 members would be obtained on even division and 12 would be secured on fractions; but the committee did not stop, as the committee that reported this bill did, when the original number of 290 was reached, but proceeded further and gave New Hampshire a Representative on a fraction of 55,450 and Florida one on a fraction of 56,223. The ratio was 131,425; so these were not major fractions; but the report stated that the reason this was done was that greater injustice would be done each of these States by not giving it the additional Representative than to other States by giving it.

The bill became a law as it passed the House.

It will thus be seen that the apportionment of 1872, fixing the House at 292, which in a few years was increased to 293 by the admission of Colorado, was another instance in which jealous care was taken to accord Representatives to States with fractions, even though they did not amount to one-half the ratio.

THE APPORTIONMENT OF 1882.

In the apportionment of 1882, under the Tenth Census, several propositions were made as to the size of the House, and a bill was reported fixing the number at 320 members. Finally an amendment was proposed by Mr. Anderson, of Kansas, fixing the number at 325 and apportioning them under the recognized method, but this number was selected largely, as is shown by the remarks of Mr. Anderson, because no State would have a major fraction unrepresented and the size of the House would not be unduly increased.

A reference to the table used at that time will show that 309 members were obtained on even division and that the remaining 16 members in order to reach the number 325 utilized all the major fractions and also two minor fractions, one in the State of New York and the other in the State of Texas.

In the apportionment of 1891 under the Eleventh Census, the committee of the House reported a bill fixing the number of members at 356, and used the following language giving the reasons for taking this number:

Trials were made until a number was found that would give a ratio which in application would secure each State against any loss in its membership and in no instance leave a major fraction. This number was found to be 356. The ratio was 173,901. The number of members obtained on even division was 339. The additional 17 needed to make the number 356 was secured by giving another member to each of the States having left to it a major fraction.

The bill passed the House and became a law.

From this history of apportionment it will be seen that since 1850 major fractions have always been accorded representation, and never in a single instance has an apportionment act failed to do so. Not only that, but in several instances large minor fractions were accorded representation when it was deemed equitable and fair to do so.

The report of this committee, if adopted, will be the first instance in which major fractions are disregarded and where an arbitrary rule or process has been adhered to, even though injustice is done to several States.

The minority insists that not only should every major fraction be recognized in making the apportionment, but also, if possible without securing an unwieldy House, that a number shall be fixed that will not reduce the representation from any State. The number, 386, under the bill proposed by the minority secures this result. Every major fraction is recognized, and a number is fixed that does not reduce the representation of any State.

KANSAS DURING THE LAST TEN YEARS.

The gentleman from Illinois, in his remarks the other day, had this to say of Kansas, which I in part represent:

The trouble is not with the bill reported by the committee, but with the condition existing in the State of Kansas. Kansas has been cursed for ten long years with Populism. Capital has been driven from the State. Energetic, progressive, splendid men who sought homes there have been driven elsewhere. That young giant, as it was ten years ago, has been a laggard in the race of the States that form the Republic. Fifty-four counties in the State of Kansas during the ten years that the Populists have been in power in that State show a decrease. * * *

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, in 54 counties of Kansas in the last ten years the population has decreased from one-half of 1 per cent to 6 per cent, and taking the entire State, it has increased in population only 3 per cent—less than the births of the State.

It is true that Kansas has gained but 43,000 in population in the last ten years. But it is not fair to refer to her as a laggard among the States simply because the last decade has shown this small increase in population. That State, from 1860 to 1870, increased 240 per cent, and from 1870 to 1880, 173 per cent. It is a State wherein progress has been made under great difficulties, and where at times the courage and fortitude of the people have been sorely tested.

Great prosperity was apparent everywhere in the closing years of the decade ending in 1890; but in 1891 times became hard, and the prosperity that had been ours to such a remarkable extent, changed to adversity. In 1893 this country experienced the greatest panic that has been known since 1837. The prices of farm products decreased to the lowest point within the memory of men then living, and Kansas, which is usually first in prosperity, at that time was first in adversity, and the people of the State early in the decade began to leave it in great numbers, hoping that in Illinois and other States they could find prosperity and happiness, which it was not their fortune to have in the State of Kansas at that time. But no sooner had they left the State, and gone to Illinois and other States, than this general panic was upon the whole country, and they regretted many times the change.

If Kansas in the midst of her misfortunes attempted to correct and improve financial conditions by unusual legislation, it is not the first time in the history of the country that this has been attempted. Kansas has not taken the initiative.

Kansas largely assisted in peopling the new Territory of Oklahoma, to the south, and many persons that were enumerated in Kansas in 1890, in 1900 were counted in making up the total population of that great Territory.

But as Kansas was first to feel the general panic that swept over the country early in the decade, so she was first among the States to feel the return of prosperity when it came, and during the last four years, and especially during the last two, she has made wonderful advancement in recuperating the wasted fortunes of her people and in returning to her old-time prosperity and enterprise.

The value of the live stock and other farm products of Kansas during the last year increased in value $28,000,000 over that of the previous year, and the value of those products during the last two years has increased $66,000,000. The banks of the State are overflowing with money deposited by its citizens. They have not only paid off their mortgages and discharged their other obligations, but they are loaning money now to the less fortunate citizens of Illinois and other States of the Republic. [Applause.]

While this progress and improvement has been apparent everywhere in the last four years, it did not come in time to bring home our wandering citizens who had gone to Illinois, Missouri, Oklahoma, and other States and Territories which make a better showing in the returns of the census than Kansas.

It is unfortunate that the chairman of a great committee should have referred to the political eccentricities of our great State. The progressive spirit of our people has always inclined Kansas to experiment with new plans and policies in political affairs, but when found of no value she has always been quick to abandon them. I am myself a living witness of the political uncertainties of our State, but I am here to-day not to represent the Republicans of Kansas, the Democrats, or the Populists, but to represent the people of the State without regard to party. If we have erred in the past, the gentleman from Illinois should not taunt us with our wrongdoing, at least after we have fully and completely reformed.

There are those of us in the State who would like to forget some things that have happened in the last ten years in the history of our State, but the gentleman from Illinois insists on fixing a number for this House that will decrease our representation for the next ten years; insists that every time a roll call is had in this House, every time a vote is taken in the Electoral College, we of Kansas shall be compelled to remember that once we had 8 Representatives in this House instead of 7, and once had 10 votes in the electoral college instead of 9. He wants this State of ours chastised, and this as an object lesson, to be held up before us continuously for the next ten years, lest we forget the occurrences of the decade just closed. It is not right, it is not just, that this situation should obtain.

Kansas is not here as a suppliant for favor from other States. She simply asks that a number may be fixed as a size for the House for the next ten years that will recognize the increase in the population of the United States. In 1870 the constitutional population of the United States was 38,000,000, and Congress in its wisdom fixed the size of the House at 292. By 1880 the House had increased to 293 by the admission of the State of Colorado. The population had increased 12,000,000, and was then 50,000,000. Congress recognized the increase of population and fixed the size of the House at 325, an increase of 32 Representatives, saying that 32 Representatives should be given to represent the 12,000,000 people who had been born under or had willingly come to live under our flag. In 1890 the population had increased 12,000,000 more, and was 62,000,000. Congress recognized the increase, and attempted to keep pace with it by increasing the size of the House to 356, being an increase of 31, saying, "We will give 31 members to represent the 12,000,000 people that we did not have ten years ago."

In 1900 the constitutional population of the States had increased 12,000,000 more, and was 74,000,000. The House has increased to 357 by the admission of Utah. The majority of the committee, for the first time in a half century, going back to the precedent of 1850, say there shall be no further increase in the size of the House of Representatives; that we shall not keep pace with the increase in population; that 357 members represented 62,000,000 people, and that the same number is sufficient to represent 74,000,000. The minority of the committee say, in line with the precedents of a half century, "We recognize the increase in population by an increase in the membership of the House of Representatives." They propose the number 386, an increase of 29, and declare that those 29 members shall be as a recognition of the 12,000,000 people who are now citizens of the United States but who were not ten years ago.

At this number no concession need be made to Kansas. She is accorded a Representative under the table following the strict process adopted by the majority of the committee. The exceptions made are in favor of the States of Nebraska and Virginia, and in making these exceptions we are following the principle laid down by Mr. Webster, which has formed the basis of the various apportionments since that time.

We are tied by no process. We are acting under the Constitution in making this apportionment, and under this high authority let us make an apportionment which will recognize the increase of population during the last ten years by enlarging the House of Representatives to keep pace with the population, and in so doing treat all the States fairly and justly, as near as may be, under this provision of the Constitution as interpreted by its greatest expounder. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, in the reapportionment of members of Congress the first question that arises should be as to the seating capacity of the hall in which they are to meet and do business, for everyone recognizes that there might be a greater number than any hall could accommodate. We have the practical experience with a hall of this size, so it needs no theory about legislation, no theory as to a proper ratio for representation.

With the Hall before us, the eye settles the question as to capacity and room for doing business. A few more seats might possibly be added, but with those we have it is the experience of everybody more than half the time that not half the members of this House can hear what is being said by whoever is entitled to the floor.

Some one may say that it is the fault of disorder. That is partially so, but the larger the Hall and the greater the number of members the greater will necessarily be the disorder. But one thing is true. It is not in the power of any Speaker of this House, now or at any time, to keep it in perfect order. There is only one way that the House can be kept in reasonably good order, and that is by every member keeping himself in order. The greater the number the more difficult it is for that to be done.

If the size of the House is increased—I am not discussing exactly what it should be—but would there be any advantage in having a larger Hall than this? Now we are crowded; members are pressing each other on either side in their seats. A few more seats might be added to this Hall, thus adding to its present discomfort. If that is done, and the number must be increased with the increase of population, then what can be done at the next census? With our experience in this Hall and the old one it would seem to be easy to determine what would be the best number for the size of the House.

The members moved from the old Hall into this one the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress. The size of the House at that time was 233. It was thought in that session it would be better to bring the members more closely together and not to have them spread over the whole of this Hall. The chairs and desks were removed. The next session plush benches, such as they have in the British Parliament, were substituted for the chairs. They remained through the short session, and at the end were then removed.

It was found very inconvenient to have no place to lay papers or books and not very convenient sitting room. I grant the benches would make more room, but the members of the House, judging by the trial made in 1858, would not continue benches in place of desks and chairs. If they would not, then there is no way of increasing the seating capacity of this Hall to any extent. But even if that could be done, it would only add to the inconvenience in doing business. Probably one-third of the present members of the House, in the ordinary course of business, can not hear what is doing if they retain their seats, even with great effort on the part of the Speaker to preserve order.

If the Speaker undertakes to keep the House in order by the use of the gavel, he makes more noise than the disorderly members; and if by the use of his voice, it is only a few minutes and it must be repeated. The experience of a hundred years with the two Halls—the old and the new—dissipates all theories of what should be the ratio of representation of the people. In the old Hall there were 233, and I think 241 was the most that ever sat in that Hall.

In this Hall there has been an increase; but in the first session of the Thirty-seventh Cangress, in July, 1861, there were about 150 members in the House, and that was all; but the full size of that House was 233, but only 150 took their seats. In the twenty-eight working days of that session more business was done, more great, vital, and important legislation was passed than in any one session of Congress since the Government began. The circumstances of that session, it is true, were peculiar. There was no difficulty in anyone being heard, and business was transacted intelligently. It was unnecessary for a member to leave his seat in order to hear all that was said in the House. With our experience in the two Houses, why should we attempt to enlarge the seating capacity of this Hall, for that is what an increase of the membership means, when it is already too large for the intelligent transaction of business? It is true the Government could build a larger Hall, but that would not diminish the difficulty that exists now, but would increase it.

Mr. Speaker, I make no attack on the rules of the House. They are different from those that existed in the old Hall and those that existed here for a few years after the House moved into this Hall. But under the old rules the Reporters of the proceedings of Congress kept their seats at their desk, and if the person addressing the Speaker could not be heard his speech was imperfectly reported. Then if the Reporters could hear the speech, all the members of the House could hear.

Now, at the Reporters' desk scarcely anyone could be heard in the ordinary proceedings of the House, which is conclusive that this Hall is quite large enough, if not larger than a hall should be, for the transaction of business. A member to-day takes the floor to discuss some question. He goes down into the area, or near it, and gathers around him a few members, and a colloquy is carried on among them, and that is called a deliberative discussion. In the proceedings in the old House and under the old rules no member was obliged to address the House by permission of a fellow-member. Now no man can address it without such permission except in rare cases.

I do not think it is a deliberative body when a Representative must ask the consent of a fellow-member for time to speak on great questions. This practice has grown up by reason of the great number of members. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that in other days my sentiments on some of the grave questions in those times were not particularly popular with the influences that controlled the House, and had I been compelled to rely upon getting the floor as a favor from the Speaker, or from any member, my voice would have been silent, and so with every other member on a grave question whose views and opinions differed from those of the controlling element in the Hall.

An increase of the members, in my judgment, would only aggravate the evils complained of in doing business in this Hall. There is not sufficient room now, and the desks have been crowded together, so that it is almost impossible to add any more. If the desks are taken out, it will only last one session I am very sure. The seating capacity of the Hall is what ought to be the size of the House, and that can not vary very much from the present membership. If it did, the argument used to-day for an increase must come with redoubled force ten years from now.

That States send their young men and women abroad into newer fields of enterprise in our country is the reason why some States of the Union will lose in population, and consequently in representation. That can not be avoided, regret it as much as we will. These old States that belonged to the original thirteen must nearly all of them lose a part of their younger population, seeking their fortunes in the newer West, by which States spring up in the wilderness with but a few people to-day, and to-morrow with their millions.

For a century the younger generation of New England have left the old homestead—left father and mother—and turning their faces toward the setting sun have gone forth to make for themselves a new home. That can not be helped. Therefore, as much as we regret it that any State in the Union should lose a single Representative in this Hall in any reapportionment of population, it is inevitable. There is no such thing as having a hall large enough to hold all the Representatives on a ratio of increased population in the next ten and twenty years.

The population of this country so far in our existence has doubled every thirty years. It will probably do about the same in the next thirty years, growing from 76,000,000 to at least 125,000,000 people. So the time is coming when it is impossible that the same ratio of representation shall continue unless you build a hall so large that even the members can not see each other in it. No scheme could be devised whereby business can be transacted intelligently and expeditiously with more than a certain number of Representatives. When you add to that number in proportion to the increase of population, the intelligent transaction of business becomes impossible.

We might as well meet the impossible to-day as to-morrow. The same question must be met under the next census, and the next one, and the same reasons will apply in both cases. It will be utterly impossible in a short time in the advancing future that the number of Representatives of the great Republic can be made on any ratio heretofore existing. That time must come. You might just as well meet the question to-day as then; and if your own convenience for the dispatch of business during our term is to be set aside and inconvenience instead of convenience substituted; if we are to sacrifice the intelligent transaction of public business in order to have undiminished representation in the old States, great and glorious as they are, which by the circumstances of life can not be helped, we might as well meet that question to-day as any time. As long as the younger generation seek new fortunes in new homes, this question is coming to us every decade, and we might just as well meet it to-day as any other time. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I find that those who support the minority bill have used up more time than those in support of the majority. I would like to have the other side use some of their time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON].

Mr. PEARSON. May I ask if I can add to that the time I received from the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. GRIFFITH]?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, there is no objection to that.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly obliged to the gentleman from Illinois, who has had a good many attacks made on him, and particularly as I am going to vote against his bill. I can not compress all I would like to say in the time allotted to me, which I believe, with that which was given to me by the gentlemen from Indiana, will make twenty-five minutes. I will not be able to make a "contiguous and compact" speech, to borrow the language of the gentleman's bill; but I desire especially to give to this House, and to my people, the reasons which compel me to vote against the Crumpacker bill, so called.

I shall vote for what is known as the Burleigh bill, knowing that it will give one more seat to North Carolina, and that that seat will be filled by a Democrat. I shall vote against the Crumpacker measure, knowing that if it should become a law there would be seven members from North Carolina, in the present complexion of politics there, and every man of them a Democrat, and the seats now filled by Republicans and which might hereafter be filled by Republicans from that State would be wiped out.

That may be called a selfish reason, Mr. Speaker. I am opposed to that measure at this time, first, because we have not the data upon which to base a uniform and permanent statute. I am opposed to it because it bears unequally upon certain States. I am opposed to it because it inflicts a punishment on North Carolina which it does not inflict upon Virginia, Georgia, and Alabama, which States simply take a different method of disfranchising their voters.

I am opposed to it because the legislation on which it is predicated, so far as my State is concerned, is manifestly unconstitutional; and it is unwise and unjust to base national legislation, to last for ten years, upon State legislation which is void and will be so declared within three years from now.

I am opposed to it, Mr. Speaker, because it excites at an inopportune moment sectional prejudice and race prejudice at a time when, thank God, and thanks to the patriotism of William McKinley, there never existed in this country a better state of feeling between the North and the South, and I would not have that feeling disturbed unless we could enact a fair, uniform, permanent statute, based upon fresh and accurate figures. The laws of Congress, like the laws of nature, ought to operate certainly, equally, and gradually—not by jerks.

I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that the figures which he quotes in reference to North Carolina are manifestly inaccurate.

The census returns indicate that there are seven or eight counties in North Carolina in which the population in the last decade has decreased. How was that brought about? It was brought about by the emigration of the negroes; and the negroes emigrated from that State because of the harsh measures of the new régime. Certain counties, and particularly, as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ] knows, the city of Raleigh, felt compelled to make a new census by local authorities. They did not credit the figures of the Federal census. They did make a new census, and that verified the Federal returns, but it was found the loss was due to the exodus of negroes, though there has been a normal increase among the whites.

Therefore, I say to the gentleman from Indiana that his bill at this time can not be fair, can not be made uniform, and I dare to say to the American people that when men suppress the right of suffrage by violence or by fraud they are just as amenable to reduction in their representation on this floor as when they suppress or restrict that suffrage under legal discriminations, under so-called constitutional enactments.

I should like to address my remarks at this time especially to my Democratic friends.

If no action is taken at this time on this question, if the Crumpacker bill fails, I say, as a Southern man whose people on both sides have lived in the South for two hundred years, we might as well recognize the fact that the time will come when there shall be an equal power given to every intelligent vote in this country. The time will come when one vote at the mouth of the Mississippi River will not be permitted to outweigh ten votes at the source of that river. I prefer that we should look this matter squarely in the face.

And let me say to my friends on the Democratic side that when this race issue was acute—when there was real danger of "negro domination"—I voted with you and against the Republican party, in spite of the fact that I indorsed its national principles. I know what you understand by race prejudice. But when the time came in my State that the largest majorities for the Democracy came from those counties where there was the largest and densest negro population I could not be fooled any longer by that cry; and then I and others joined in the movement which overturned the Democratic party in that State. And I say to my friends that we might as well recognize the fact that the time is coming when the equilibrium of this Government will not permit such a strain as that which gives ten times as much power to a Southern vote as is accorded to a Northern vote. We can not say precisely when it will come.

Many of us will agree—there is a Republican leader of this House who is sitting before me [pointing to Mr. HEPBURN], and another on my right [Mr. HOPKINS], who will agree—that if Abraham Lincoln had lived, that if that fateful bullet had not stopped the throbbing of his great heart, the troubles that grew out of reconstruction, the troubles that grew out of the enfranchisement of a great mass of ignorant men all at once, would have been avoided.

But it is just as true—and the historian who writes up this period of our history will so say—that whatever the fourteenth amendment may be called, whether it be called a blunder or, as some of you gentlemen would say, a crime, it has failed of its purpose. Its only present effect is to give 39 seats in this House and in the electoral college to the Democratic party, and to throw upon the Republicans of the nation such charges as the Democrats habitually in each campaign make on account of it. It has strengthened the hands it intended to curb and crippled the creatures it intended to aid. The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, instead of being muniments of right, have been converted into instruments of injustice; instead of being pillars of the Constitution, they have been converted into two black signposts, pointing deluded believers to their doom. Lincoln's death was to the South the loss of her best friend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, my time, as I have already stated, has been gathered from various quarters; but I was to have twenty-five minutes altogether.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. From what source does the gentleman get his time?

Mr. PEARSON. From the very generous gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] five minutes, from the very courteous gentleman from Illinois ten minutes, and from my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. GRIFFITH] fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But neither of the gentlemen from Indiana had any time to give. The debate is being conducted under the order of the House——

Mr. PEARSON. Then I appeal to the sense of fairness of this body. It will be remembered that this morning when I withdrew my opposition to an arrangement then proposed, it was suggested that an arrangement would be made——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRIFFITH].

Mr. GROW. As it is now so near time of adjournment, and as no other gentleman probably desires to speak this evening, I suggest that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended ten minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no objection to that if the time is not taken from our side.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may have in all twenty-five minutes, to be taken equally from the two sides.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. OTEY. I desire to know whether that arrangement would extend the time for general debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. OTEY. Then, of course, it would have the effect of diminishing the time already allotted to other gentlemen. Therefore I object. I am perfectly willing that the general time be extended fifteen minutes. I ask unanimous consent that the time be so extended that the gentleman may conclude his speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the time for general debate be extended fifteen minutes. The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered. Unanimous consent is now asked that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] may proceed for fifteen minutes longer, the additional time to be taken equally from the two sides. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems a pity that a matter of this importance should be put through this body in such haste—in such marked contrast with the process which would be followed in the Senate. This is the best proof that we could have that under the rules of this House we could get along just as well with 600 members as with 357. [Applause.] Whatever the number of members, you can take a man off this floor, you can gag him, you can turn him out of his seat here, without giving him an opportunity to be intelligently and intelligibly heard.

You do not need any better answer to the gentleman from Illinois than the mere fact which we witness now—that it is by begging and pleading and holding up our hands that we are permitted to get a few moments to express incoherently and insufficiently our views on the greatest question that has been presented here at this term.

Mr. GAINES. Did the gentleman vote for the present rules of the House?

Mr. PEARSON. I voted for the rules of the House, and I am glad to say that we have them. We can transact more business here under those rules in two hours than they can at the other end of the Capitol in ten days.

Mr. GAINES. By gagging everybody?

Mr. PEARSON. And that is the best argument for an increase in the size of the House. Its business is transacted through its committees. The committees are the eyes and ears and arms of this body, as has been stated by Speaker Reed.

Now, when I was so suddenly taken off the floor I was about to say that the bitterness which followed the war and the assassination of President Lincoln was followed in the South by what was known as "the Black Codes." The Black Codes were followed in the North by what was known as the fourteenth amendment. Then came military government, and then the horrors of reconstruction.

Those measures were followed in the South by the secret Kuklux Klan. The Kuklux Klan was suppressed by rigid prosecutions emanating from this end of the line; and then, when the secret organization was suppressed, came the open, bold, unapologetic red-shirt violence of 1876, which captured the State governments. Then came an attempt at a "force bill," which passed this House. What followed? A Democratic majority of 107, I think, immediately.

Then there was a repeal of the last vestige of Federal legislation on the subject of elections. And what followed that? That was done, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] knows, by his party in the Fifty-third Congress, and it received the stout and almost solid antagonism of the Republican party, but what was the result? The next House was Republican by over 100 majority, showing that there was a disposition on the part of the people that elections should be regulated by the several States.

But the most important thing in this series of acts and counteracts, of crimination and recrimination, of taliation and retaliation, if I may be allowed the expression, the most significant fact is a thing that was omitted, and that is that there has been no attempt in three Republican Congresses to reenact any Federal statute on the subject of elections. That is the most significant thing, I believe, that has occurred in six years past.

It means that the leaders of the Republican party have determined to leave to the several States the regulation of the franchise. It does not mean that frauds will be tolerated; it does not mean that unconstitutional enactments will be made and indefinitely allowed; but it does mean that whenever these States in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution shall so regulate their elections as to bear equally upon all their people, neither this House, this Congress, nor the President is inclined to interfere, and I am glad to recognize that fact.

Instead of appealing to this body for punitive laws or to the President for troops at the polls, I prefer to appeal to the consciences of my people, to the spirit of the old Whigs, which has always been for honesty and liberty, and I want no better proof that this appeal will not be in vain than the petitions now circulating in my State demanding a repeal of these monstrous election laws and signed by Democrats all over the State. I insert below a copy of these petitions, and I know that the fair-minded men of all parties who have signed these demands will not allow them to be denied or ignored.

The race prejudice is a thing which many of our Northern friends here do not understand. It is not an imaginary conception or a fancy. It is a concrete, an obdurate, an inexorable fact. I know it. It is this that has, in my judgment, prevented the South—the old slave South—from giving a solitary electoral vote for the Republican party in these fifteen or twenty years past.

Mr. Speaker, when will there be a President of the United States chosen from the South? It will be after the measure presented in the Crumpacker bill, perfected, based upon a uniform and fair law, has been accepted by the South and race prejudice has been softened or eliminated; not before. I long to see the day when South Carolina will honestly vote the Republican ticket and Vermont will voluntarily go Democratic.

Then we will have a free circulation of the currents of political thought in this country, and until such a day comes there will not be another President elected from the Southern States. And this thought emboldens me, here and now, to appeal to my brethren from the South to recognize the fact that if this measure is now postponed the initiative would properly come from their States—from Louisiana, from North Carolina, from South Carolina, from Mississippi, from Virginia, which will act next month; from Alabama, which will act during the year; and from the others, saying, "Men and brethren, we do not require that our representation here shall be based upon a vacuum. We do not require that the negro vote shall be counted in the basis of enumeration if it is not counted at the ballot-box. We will deliberately surrender a part of our electoral power if we can have peace in our homes. And when fear is banished from our homes, then will come charity to our hearts, then will be the wiping away of this prejudice which has been the most deterrent force in our affairs."

Why, it is stronger than religion. It is stronger than a man's conception of his oath to the Constitution. It is stronger even than the religion of an Arab. It makes men vote contrary to their sentiments. There is no discussion of economic, or social, or political questions, in the broad sense, in the overshadowing presence of the race issue.

Mr. Speaker, the race prejudice will vanish, but it will take a long time. The solvent of the race problem will be the alchemy of years, the long result of time, carrying with it certain forces which are already at work, which will be constantly at work in the future—first, the gradual but constant acquisition of property by the negro; second, the gradual but constant acquisition of knowledge by the negro; third, the gradual but constant dispersion of the negroes from the congested centers of the South; fourth, the gradual but ever increasing division of the negro vote; and, fifth, more than all that, the accelerating gain of the white population in the matter of its increase as compared with the negroes, which is one of the most interesting questions now before us.

We have a larger natural increase among the whites than among the blacks, but more than that the immigration naturally pouring into this country, almost all of it white, nearly doubles the proportion. And so it will go on gaining from year to year, and in the course of time, under God's providence, that question will be eliminated, and then will come the dawning of a grander day, because I know, and I believe I can speak the sentiments of my friends across the aisle, we are glad that the war between the States ended as it did.

We are glad that slavery was abolished. I take the liberty of saying in this presence that I myself was a slaveholder. As a child 8 years of age I owned slaves. How could I help myself? They came to me by inheritance. They were mine. In the course of my brief lifetime there is such a change of sentiment on that subject of slavery and such an abhorrence now in my own heart and such a feeling against it that I dare say here in this presence and before the world, as God is my judge, that I, once a slaveholder, would rather sell myself this minute than own a slave. [Applause.]

It shows a change, a revulsion, a revolution in sentiment, and I hope to God that on this race question there will be, in the process of time, a change. We are glad that slavery was abolished. We are glad that we have not two flags here on this American continent, not two separate governments with conflicting laws and antagonistic commercial systems. We are glad that we have one flag, one country, one common and splendid destiny.

When we look back to the life of Lincoln, we feel that we are moving on in the course and toward the goal for which he prayed, for which he longed, for which he died; and we are glad at this time, Mr. Speaker, to find a successor to Abraham Lincoln in the White House who has uttered such words as McKinley uttered at Atlanta. He touched the Southern heart when he proposed to take care of the graves of our fathers and brothers who died fighting for a cause that we believed to be right. He touched our hearts when he appointed Lee and the Gordons and Wheeler into our Army to fight for that flag in foreign lands. He is entitled to the thanks of the whole country for his magnanimous course, and he is entitled especially to the thanks of our Southern men, who always appreciate magnanimity. [Applause.]

APPENDIX I.

[From Asheville Daily Gazette, November 14, 1900.]

HOW THE WRONG WAS RIGHTED—VERDICT IN PEARSON VS. CRAWFORD.

In the campaign just ended in this district the paramount issue was the merits of the contest. Mr. Crawford's partisans wore flaming red badges bearing the inscription "Right the wrong." The color indicated wrath, the words expressed the impatient confidence and suppressed vengeance of the manly bosoms on which the ribbons fluttered. The naked returns of the election tell the rest. We give below the official figures in the six rejected precincts, which were the only precincts rejected by the House of Representatives in determining the contest:

Vote in rejected precincts.

Precinct.	1898.		1900.		Republican gain.
	Pearson.	Crawford.	Moody.	Crawford.
South Waynesville	77	313	220	106	262
Ivy, No. 1	161	172	250	92	169
Limestone	108	136	112	91	49
Old Fort	126	187	143	168	36
Black Mountain	84	135	101	145	7
Marble	21	74	46	84	15
Net Republican gain					538

The above figures show that the Republicans gained in every one of the rejected precincts and actually reversed the Democratic majorities in three of them. The result shows to the world that the voters in these rejected precincts did not feel aggrieved, but on the contrary felt rejoiced that the attempted frauds upon their suffrages had been righteously rebuked.

APPENDIX II.

ANALYSIS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND OF THE ELECTION LAW OF 1899.

[The following article, which was first published on September 24, 1899, received the indorsement of the Republican State executive committee on October 18, as follows: "Resolved, That the thanks of the Republicans of the State are due the Hon. RICHMOND PEARSON for his able and manly letter on the proposed constitutional amendment and the election law, and that the committee indorse the views therein expressed."]

We are midway between the elections of 1898 and 1900. We are far enough removed from the excitement of both struggles to look backward and to look forward calmly and dispassionately. Next year North Carolina will be forced to face the gravest situation which has confronted her since 1860.

Then the question was, Will the State secede from the Union? Now the question is, Will the State violate the fundamental condition on which she was readmitted into the Union. And the Democratic voters will have to decide whether they will break the solemn promise which their chairman and official head made in their name to the people of the State before the last election.

The good faith of a sovereign State and the ancient honor of a great party can not be treated or disposed of lightly; they demand thoughtful, anxious, and reverent consideration.

THE FUNDAMENTAL CONDITION.

In 1868 the people of North Carolina adopted a constitution establishing universal suffrage, and in June of that year the State was readmitted into the Union subject to the fundamental condition that her constitution should never be changed so as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the right to vote conferred by that constitution.

That fundamental condition is still in force and will continue in force until the State attempts to break it.

The learned gentlemen who advocate the proposed amendment will not deny that it contravenes the act of Congress in that it will disfranchise some citizens upon whom the suffrage was conferred by the act of 1868.

These learned gentlemen will hardly pronounce the act of Congress unconstitutional because the validity of the reconstruction acts has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States, the final arbiter, the tribunal of last resort, and the great Judge Cooley, in commenting upon this exercise of Federal power (Cons. Lim., p. 34 n), feelingly observes:

"It suffices for the present to say that Congress claimed, insisted upon, and enforced the right to prescribe the steps to be taken and the conditions to be observed in order to restore these States to their former positions in the Union."

And he expresses the—

"Hope and trust that the occasion for discussing such questions will never arise again."

THE DEMOCRATIC PLEDGE.

In September, 1898, Mr. F. M. Simmons, chairman of the State Democratic committee, issued to the people of the State an address, which was both a promise and a protest, in which he uses these words:

"For the past twenty years or more, just before every election, the Republican speakers, at their midnight meetings, have been in the habit of telling the negro if the Democrats came into power the right to vote would be taken away from them.

"First, they told them if the Democrats got the State government they would disfranchise them. The Democrats got the State government, and did not disfranchise them. Then they told them if the Democrats elected a President they would disfranchise them. The Democrats elected a President, and they did not disfranchise them. Then they told them if the Democrats got control of Congress they would disfranchise them. The Democrats got control of Congress, and did not disfranchise them. All along the honest white men of the State laughed at these lies, and marveled that the negro did not have sense enough to see that he was duped.

"Finally the negro himself began to see through the trick. He had seen the Democrats in full power in the State for twenty-two years, and had learned from experience that that party did not propose to disfranchise him, and he, too, began to laugh at these liars, and finally refused to be frightened by their rot any longer. So the old Republican scarecrow had to be hauled down and put away. * * *

"They know that the Democratic party has always stood for manhood suffrage, and they know that the Democratic party will never, under any circumstances under the sun, consent to the passage of any law which will take from them, however poor and ignorant they may be, the right to vote, or which will in any way diminish or lessen that great privilege."

IT GAINED VOTES.

This promise was so circumstantial, so earnest, so indignant, so plausible, and so fortified by political history that it almost compelled belief; it silenced the warnings of intelligent Republicans and allayed the suspicions of the timid and ignorant and gained votes by the thousands for the Democrats, who actually carried the black district and carried the county of Halifax by 1,500 majority.

And yet, with that promise fresh on his lips, without explanation and without apology, Mr. Simmons himself inaugurates and leads the movement to disfranchise the men he had promised to defend; to sacrifice the victims whom his promise had deluded; to betray the confidence which had gained for him the victory.

It should be borne in mind that the act of the assembly in 1874 calling the constitutional convention required every delegate to that convention to take an oath that they "shall not require or propose any educational qualification for office or for voting."

The proportion, both of negroes and of illiterates, in the State at that time was much greater than it is now. What would be said of the delegates to that convention if they had violated the oath and proceeded to pass the "grandfather clause" and to extol the hereditary instinct of the white man in locating his vote as proven by the hereditary instinct of the setter dog in his God-given faculty of locating the quail?

The only difference between the former case and the present is that there the members took the oath individually and here Mr. Simmons, as chairman, makes the pledge for his party. The sanction and binding force upon the honor and conscience is the same. Our amazement at the course of Mr. Simmons is increased by the following from the Washington Post of last winter:

WHAT SENATOR CAFFERY SAID.

"It was learned yesterday that the action of the North Carolina legislature in regard to a constitutional provision for the restriction of suffrage was largely based upon a visit made to this city by several leading North Carolina Democrats. Among others to whom the delegation talked was Senator CAFFERY, of Louisiana, and the Louisiana plan has been accepted by the North Carolinians. It provides that a voter whose father and grandfather voted in any State prior to January 1, 1867, shall be exempt from the property and educational qualifications prescribed in the other articles of the State constitution."

This means, of course, that it disfranchises the negro.

"At the same time Senator CAFFERY, as he said yesterday, was very frank to inform the delegation that he did not regard the provision as constitutional. 'It creates a privileged class,' he said, 'and I told the people of my State that it would not stand a test when they adopted it. If the legislature of North Carolina has accepted the same provision, I believe that they will find their work undone for them as soon as the matter is brought before the United States Supreme Court.'"

Notwithstanding this advice of Senator CAFFERY, in which his colleague, Senator MCENERY, formerly chief justice of Louisiana, fully concurs, and in which the Post says every "jurisconsult" in the land concurs, most of the learned gentlemen in North Carolina who have favored the public with their views in advocacy of the amendment start out by "assuming" the constitutionality of the measure. In the light of the decisions of our Supreme Court reviewing the political acts of the present legislature the impartial layman would be justified in assuming quite the reverse, because the court has been overruling these acts in almost every instance.

It is amazing that the learned advocates of this measure—men of excellent and approved common sense, who avow their purpose boldly—should fancy that they have successfully concealed that purpose in a periphrastic form of definition.

The ostrich on the desert, with his head in the sand and his body exposed, is the only bird which concludes that he is successfully concealed in that interesting attitude and that nobody can see him because he can see nobody.

PROMISE MADE TO BLACKS AND WHITES.

Mr. Simmons's antecelection promise was made with equal force and with equal solemnity to black illiterates and to white illiterates.

He now promises with great vehemence of expression and mysterious rolling of the eye that he will not disfranchise any white man, "however poor and ignorant."

These men, whose ignorance is largely due to the neglect of the State, will naturally inquire whether a person who breaks a promise to a black man can be trusted to keep a promise to a white man, and, further, to inquire in what code of morals the color of the promise impairs the obligation of the promise, and, further, to inquire if in the court of conscience and of honor the helplessness of the promisee and his inability to enforce performance does not increase rather than diminish the sanction of the promise.

These illiterate whites, before risking their salvation to Mr. Simmons, will be moved further to inquire at what particular point in his lively career did Mr. Simmons evince his special regard for the rights of the "poor and ignorant" white man. If they go back to 1886 they will find that Mr. Simmons disfranchised some 2,000 voters in Vance and Warren counties, not so much on the ground of color as because they had voted against Mr. Simmons for Congress.

And if they go back to 1892 they will find that Mr. Simmons, operating under the decision of Harris vs. Scarboro, disfranchised 49,000 voters, not on account of color, but because their names were not written in the registration books with sufficient fullness and particularity to suit the refined, critical, and exacting taste of Mr. Simmons.

And they will find that the Federal House of Representatives, containing a majority of Democrats, overruled Mr. Simmons's scheme of disfranchisement in the case of Williams vs. Settle, and that the people made haste in 1894 to overthrow Mr. Simmons at the polls, and the Supreme Court effectively suppressed his methods by their ruling in Quinn vs. Lattimore. In spite of all this, though slightly disfigured and somewhat discredited, here he comes again, still unabashed, asking poor and ignorant men to trust his naked promises and to accept his constitutional views, which have been tried and found wanting, tested and tattered and shattered by the people, the courts, and the Congress.

SEPARATE LOCAL GOVERNMENTS.

I take the liberty of saying that I am opposed to negro domination and have never feared such domination since Halifax became the banner Democratic county of the State.

I heartily indorse the act of the present legislature, chapter 488, entitled "An act to restore good government to the counties of North Carolina," which gives certain counties in the east a separate form of government. I advocated a similar measure in the legislature of 1897, and I insisted upon section 5, chapter 135, of the laws of 1895—in fact, wrote the original draft of the section providing for bipartisan boards of commissioners in certain contingencies. The aim and the effect of this provision has been to safeguard the financial interests of these counties and render impossible incompetent or corrupt control by either blacks or whites.

In my judgment this separate county government law makes the proposed amendment wholly unnecessary.

SUMMARY OF REASONS.

I now submit, without fear of argument, a summary of my reasons for opposing the amendment:

1. I am opposed to it because I am convinced that it conflicts with the Federal Constitution.

2. I am opposed to it because I know and its advocates do not deny that it violates the act of Congress by which the State was readmitted into the Union.

3. I am opposed to it because I, along with every registered voter in the State, have taken an oath to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I can not violate the law which readmitted the State without violating my oath.

4. I am opposed to it because I can not accept the invitation of its most eloquent advocate "to sink my conscience for the public good." I deny the possibility of promoting public good by sinking private conscience.

5. I am opposed to it because it requires payment of poll tax as a prerequisite to voting, and this will unavoidably increase corruption in politics.

6. I am opposed to it because it will disfranchise all or none of the illiterates, both black and white. If it disfranchises none, it will be a useless and mischievous agitation. If it disfranchises all, it will be an act of cruelty and perfidy without parallel.

7. I am opposed to it because, instead of eliminating forever the negro question, if it is literally construed and strictly enforced it must leave the ballot in the hands of 54,000 negroes, 40,000 who can read and 14,000 half-breeds, mulattoes, and quadroons, while it will take away the ballot from the humble, docile, and inoffensive black in the country who live on the farms and are voting more and more with the men whose lands they till, if kindly treated by their landowners.

8. I am opposed to it because it is not needed in the East, where separated local governments are already established, and because it is not wanted in the West by either Democrats or Republicans.

9. I am opposed to it because under the best construction its operation will be a failure and under the worse construction its operation will be a crime.

10. I am opposed to it because I believe the more completely we treat the negro as a brute without rights the more completely he will act as a brute without obligation, and because I believe that it is dangerous to the law and order, peace and progress of the State to have within her borders a great body of men without master, without protection, without guide, without hope, without higher restraint than the fear of punishment, and without higher incentive than the pangs of hunger and thirst.

NEW ELECTION LAW VOID.

Our new election law is the product of a cross between the Goebel law of Kentucky and the Tillman law of South Carolina.

The child bears a striking resemblance to both parents.

The human part of our machine is drawn from Goebel, the mechanical part is drawn from TILLMAN; but the worst parts are drawn from the brain of the author, who stands, like an acrobat, with one foot on Goebel's shoulder, the other on TILLMAN'S shoulder, and performs feats of daring which outclass his supporters and place him deservedly in the rank of Machiavelli.

The origin of our law is seen by a glance at the following parallel:

GOEBEL ELECTION LAW.	SIMMONS ELECTION LAW.
SEC. 1. The general assembly shall at its present session elect three commissioners, who shall be styled "The State board of election commissioners."	SEC. 4. That there shall be a State board of elections consisting of seven discreet persons, who shall be electors, elected by the general assembly at its present session.
SEC. 2. Said State board of election commissioners shall annually, not later than the month of September, appoint three election commissioners for each county, who shall be styled "The county board of election commissioners."	SEC. 5. That there shall be in every county in the State a county board of elections, to consist of three discreet persons who are electors in the county in which they are to act, who shall be appointed as hereinafter provided by the State board of elections.
SEC. 3. Said county board shall annually, not later than the month of October, appoint for each election precinct in the county two judges, one clerk, and one sheriff of election to act as such in their precinct.	SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the county board of elections in each county to appoint all registrars and judges of election in their respective counties.

WATTERSON DESCRIBES THE GOEBEL LAW.

The Courier-Journal, in an editorial written by Henry Watterson himself, said of it:

"The people may well stand aghast before the revolutionary election bill which has, like some dread monster, suddenly emerged from the fastness of passion and error through which the legislature has been threading its tortuous way.

"It is safe to say that the annals of free government will be sought in vain for anything approaching it in shameless effrontery and unconcealed deformity. The records of reconstruction furnish nothing to compare with it. The Brownlow despotism at its worst ventured upon nothing so boldly, wholly bad as this.

"In all the force bills meditated by the radicals in Congress during the days of reconstruction there were discernible some pretense or pretext, some lingering memory of republican instincts and traditions. Even in the plebiscites of Louis Napoleon there was the outward display of a just electoral process and purpose.

"This force bill gives the voters of Kentucky not a ray of hope. It makes no claim or show of fairness. It places exclusively in the hands of three irresponsible persons, to be named by the authors of the measure itself, the entire electoral machinery of the State. That is the whole of it. In one word and at one fell swoop Kentucky is to become the subject of a triumvirate which is to decide who shall hold office and who shall not."

THE NEW LAW.

Mr. Simmons appears to have overlooked one great truth in toxicology—that a grain of poison will kill the victim, but an ounce of the same poison will so shock the stomach that it will be rejected. Dr. Simmons has administered an overdose. The act, chapter 507, laws of 1899, entitled "An act to regulate elections," is unconstitutional and void because:

1. It requires an educational qualification.
2. It virtually requires the payment of a poll tax.
3. It confers arbitrary powers upon the registrars and judges of election.
4. It denies the fundamental rights of man.

Ever since the Halifax convention, that is to say, during a period of one hundred and twenty-four years, every election law in force in North Carolina has made it the duty of the judges of election to deposit the ballots in the proper ballot boxes.

Now, for the first time in the State's history, this provision is significantly omitted, and the voter must deposit his own ballot, and if he puts it in the wrong box, the ballot is void.

ANOTHER REQUIREMENT.

There are not less than five boxes in a general election. Therefore in order to exercise the right of suffrage the voter must be able to read the labels on the different boxes.

This requirement conflicts with article 6, section 1, of our constitution, and is therefore void.

2. The law, section 11, requires the registrar to ask the applicant for registration:

"Whether he has listed for taxation his poll tax for the current year in which he proposes to register and for the year next preceding, if liable to pay a poll tax."

And further, the same section provides:

"That if any applicant for registration who is permitted to register shall confess upon his examination under oath at the time he is admitted to registration that he has not listed his poll for taxation for the current year in that year, or if he shall admit that the time of his said application is after the time fixed by law for listing taxes, or did not list his poll for taxation for the year next preceding, it shall be the duty of the registrar to certify said fact or facts to the clerk of the superior court of his county, and the said clerk shall hand such certificate to the solicitor for the district at the next term of the superior court, and the solicitor shall, without delay, draw and send to the grand jury a bill of indictment against such elector so registering for failure to list his poll tax."

INDICTMENT OF VOTERS.

The law says to the voter, "If you vote without listing your poll tax, you shall be indicted."

It is idle to contend that this does not make the listing of the poll for taxation a prerequisite to voting. Where is the man who will stand an indictment in order to enjoy the luxury of voting?

This requirement of the law is in conflict with Article VI, section 1, of our constitution, and is therefore void.

In Van Bokkelen vs. Canaday (73 N. C. R., p. 222), the court declares: "The general assembly can not in any way change the qualifications of voters in State, county, township, city, or town elections."

And in Railroad vs. Commissioners (72 N. C. R., p. 492).

The constitution defines who are the qualified voters of a county (Art. VI, sec. 1), and the legislature can not change the qualifications.

In the law which we are considering the legislature has attempted to force upon the people the very qualifications on which they have invited the people to pronounce judgment in the form of a constitutional amendment. They attempt to put into operation tests of the right of suffrage before such tests have been adopted by the people.

This is condemning a man first and trying him afterwards.

3. After the intending voter has proved his qualifications with the most stringent particularity by the oath of two other voters, and, in addition thereto, has himself taken the prescribed oath, we find in section 22 the following:

"Provided, That after such oath shall have been taken the registrars and judge may nevertheless refuse to permit such person to vote, unless they can be satisfied that he is a legal voter."

In other words, after the applicant has furnished all the proof required by the law he may nevertheless be rejected and disfranchised by the arbitrary decision of the registrar and judge.

In the case of Van Bokkelen vs. Canaday (73 N. C. R., p. 229), Judge Rodman says:

"The right to vote is property, and no man can be deprived of it 'but by the law of the land,' and the arbitrary will of the registrar is not 'the law of the land' in the well-settled meaning of the bill of rights."

THE MASTER STROKE.

4. We now come to the master stroke.

Section 23 provides:

"That a space of not more than 50 feet in every direction from the polls or the room in which the election is held may be kept open and clear of all persons except the election officers herein provided, which space may be railed or roped off, with a narrow passage leading to and from the polls.

* * * * * * * *

"After the elector has entered the passage no one except the registrar or judges of election or challengers hereinafter provided for shall be permitted to speak to him or make any signs to him, nor shall he be permitted to speak or make any signs to anyone except the registrar or judge of election."

What is the meaning and the object of this most extraordinary provision? Remember that the law takes away from the judges the duty of "carefully depositing the ballot in the ballot box" and repeals the former law declaring that "a ballot found in the wrong box shall be presumed to have been put there by mistake;" that section 29, the new law, declares "if a ballot be found in the wrong box, it shall not be numbered, but shall be void," so that the voter must deposit his ballot with his own hand and take the chances of getting it in the right box or of losing his vote. The educated man can read the labels on the boxes, but the illiterate man, black or white, is helpless in this respect, so that this monstrous provision is aimed exclusively at the ignorant man, and the purpose in denying him the right of asking questions or making signs is to increase the chances of his hitting the wrong box. The law thus becomes an active partner in the cheating, and the State, which has neglected to educate her children, is put in the attitude of mocking their misfortune and of adding to their helplessness. Mind you, the victim in the narrow passage is a white man and a Democrat; he holds in his hand a ballot "Against amendment;" his executioners are two partisan Democrats and one pretended Republican, all favoring the amendment. They tell him to "vote lively and pass along;" he drops his ticket into the legislative box and it is lost and he is disfranchised. Mr. Simmons, is this the "poor and ignorant white" man whom you have promised to protect? Is this law the best proof you can give of your devotion to his rights and interests?

THE RIGHTS OF VOTERS IGNORED.

Do you pretend that this provision will be enforced in the east but not in the west? The answer is:

"All regulations of the election franchise, however, must be reasonable, uniform, and impartial. They must not have for their purpose, directly or indirectly, to deny or abridge the constitutional right of citizens to vote or unnecessarily to impede its exercise; if they do, they must be declared void." (Cooley Cons. Lim., p. 602.)

So that your law must be uniform or it will be declared void. The right to establish separate local governments in the different counties comes from the express grant of power in section 14, Article VII, of the constitution, but Article VI on suffrage contains no such authority.

Mr. Simmons must know that our mountain people, Democrats as well as Republicans, will resent the operation of section 23 of the election law. Men who cherish the memories of Kings Mountain and Mecklenburg will not permit themselves to be driven into a slaughter pen like dumb brutes and denied the right "to speak or make signs;" they will not permit the act of voting, which they have regarded as an act of pride and dignity, to be converted into an act of personal humiliation and shame.

You might just as well require them to crawl through the narrow passage on their all fours, sprinkle dust on their heads, and thus offer the "grand salaam" to your election bailiffs.

You might just as well deny the right of a lost traveler to ask which is the right road as deny to the bewildered voter the right to ask which is the right box.

The law, in denying the fundamental rights of the citizen and the natural rights of man, is in conflict with our bill of rights, and is therefore void.

Mr. Simmons, have you never read these words of Chatham:

"The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the Crown. It may be frail, its roof may shake, the wind may blow through it, the storm may enter, the rain may enter, but the King of England may not enter. All his force dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement."

And I am bold enough to tell you that the force of all your election bailiffs dare not invade the constitutional rights of the poorest illiterate white man in these mountains.

RICHMOND PEARSON.

APPENDIX III.

PETITION FOR AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ELECTION LAW.

To the honorable the General Assembly of North Carolina:

The undersigned citizens and voters of North Carolina respectfully and humbly petition your honorable body to amend the existing election law in the following particulars, to wit:

First. That sections 88 and 89 be repealed, so as to restore the functions which have belonged to the judiciary since the foundation of our Government.

Second. That the registrars shall be required before entering upon their duties to take an oath to discharge honestly and impartially the duties of their office.

Third. That the judges of election shall carefully deposit the ballots in the proper ballot boxes, and that ballots found in the wrong box, if the poll list shows that such ballots have been honestly cast, but misplaced, shall not be void, but shall be counted according to the manifest will of the voter.

Fourth. That any officer of election who knowingly and willfully commits fraud shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by fine and imprisonment.

Fifth. That one member of each county board of elections shall be of a different political party from that of the other two members of the board. And the judges of election, chosen under section 17 of the existing law to represent the minority party, shall be selected from a list of names of honest and competent men presented to the several county boards of election by the chairman of the county executive committee representing such minority party.

Sixth. That in passing upon the qualifications of an elector the officers of election shall be bound by the ordinary and long-established rules of evidence.

We respectfully submit that these demands are reasonable, that they are founded upon manifest principles of justice, and are essential to the honest expression of the popular will, the foundation stone of a republican form of government.

APPENDIX IV.

LETTER OF EXPLANATION TO ACCOMPANY THE PETITION.

DEAR SIR: The demands set forth in the accompanying petition are so simple and reasonable that an explanation seems hardly necessary. As the constitutional amendment goes into effect before the date of the next general election, there can be no honest excuse, even among partisans, to refuse to allow the voters who may still be entitled to vote a reasonably fair expression of their will, and it is confidently believed that thousands of fair-minded Democrats will join in the effort to secure this result and sign the petition for that purpose.

The first demand, if granted by the legislature, simply restores to the courts the right to issue writs of mandamus and injunction in cases where election officers refuse to do their duty or openly violate their duty. These great writs have never heretofore been suspended in North Carolina in time of peace.

The second demand simply requires the registrars to take an oath to discharge their duty honestly and impartially. No officer will refuse to take an oath unless he intends to commit a fraud.

The third demand requires the judges to deposit the ballots in the proper ballot box. This law has been upon our statute books for one hundred and twenty-three years—in fact, ever since the formation of the State. But it was repealed by the legislature of 1899, and in many places during the August election the voters were required to deposit their own ballots, and of course the illiterate voters were thus subjected to an unconstitutional test. The people of Transylvania County lost the representative of their choice solely because the judges of election of Brevard required the voters to deposit their own ballots, which in many instances went into the wrong box and were thus destroyed as completely as if they had been cast in the fire. The honest men of North Carolina will not submit to the permanent enforcement of this unjust, cruel, and unconstitutional provision, but will eagerly join in the demand for its repeal.

The fourth demand simply provides that an election officer who willfully commits fraud shall be punished. Who will deny the manifest justice of this demand?

The fifth demand provides for minority representation on the county and precinct boards of election, and requires that the officers who are chosen to represent the minority party shall be honest and competent, instead of being corrupt and illiterate, as many of them confessedly were at the August election. Republicans would naturally prefer to select an honest Democrat as their representative rather than a dishonest Republican.

The sixth demand simply requires that the election officers, in passing upon the qualifications of electors, and as such acting in a judicial capacity, shall be bound by the same rules of evidence as would govern superior court judges in discharging their functions.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed as a Senate document 3,000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on Senate bill 4300.

BREAKWATER AT BURLINGTON, VT.

PAPER ON PARCELS POST.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have printed as a document an article on parcels posts, written by Mahlon H. White—an excellent contribution to the subject. I ask, therefore, that it be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I object to private contributions being printed at the expense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Committee amendments are still in order.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. BATE. An amendment was under consideration yesterday evening, and I think we had better dispose of it first. It was laid over upon the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A committee amendment?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; the committee have approved it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rose to suggest that the so-called canteen amendment was laid over until this morning and that I am prepared to proceed with the consideration of that amendment. I have no objection to the amendment to which the attention of the Chair has been called being acted on first.

Mr. BATE. I thought it was acted on finally yesterday evening, but I see by the RECORD it was not. We had better finish it this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee offers, on behalf of the committee, an amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, line 7, after the word "examination," insert the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War be authorized to appoint in the Hospital Corps, in addition to the 200 hospital stewards now allowed by law, 100 hospital stewards: Provided, That men who have served as hospital stewards of volunteer regiments or acted in that capacity during and since the Spanish-American war for more than six months may be appointed hospital stewards in the Regular Army: And provided further, That all men so appointed shall be of good moral character and shall have passed a satisfactory mental and physical examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment is what is known as the canteen amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read the provision inserted by the House, as follows:

The sale of or dealing in beer, wine, or any intoxicating liquors by any person in any post exchange or canteen or Army transport, or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States, is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 strike out the word "beer," and in line 5, after the words "or any" strike out the words "intoxicating liquors" and insert in lieu thereof "distilled spirits," so as to read:

The sale of or dealing in wine or any distilled spirits by any person in any post exchange or canteen or Army transport or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the Army reorganization bill that became a law March 2, 1899, the following provision was inserted, being section 17 of the statute:

That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

Those of us who voted for that provision supposed that its adoption would terminate liquor selling in the Army. But it will be remembered that the Attorney-General made the remarkable discovery that it did not mean what it said, and as a consequence the canteen has continued as a part of the Army equipment.

The bill now under consideration as it came from the House of Representatives contained this clause:

The sale of or dealing in beer, wine, or any intoxicating liquors by any person in any post exchange or canteen or Army transport or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has changed that provision, and recommends that it shall be adopted after the word "beer" has been stricken out and the words "distilled spirits" substituted for the words "intoxicating liquors," thus permitting the sale of beer to be continued at Army posts.

Mr. President, the question as to whether or not we shall tolerate saloons in connection with our Army posts and encampments is again before the Senate for consideration. A few days ago the so-called Lodge resolution was adopted by the Senate, the purpose of which was to place our Government in unison with other great governments of the world in the matter of treaties to protect the aboriginal races from the effects of intoxicants. Notwithstanding that action on the part of the Senate—of which I approved—it is now proposed that our Government shall continue in the saloon business in connection with the military camps of the country, thus placing our soldier boys under constant temptation.

In other words, by passing the Lodge resolution we joined hands in protecting the savages from the evil effects of strong drink, and now we propose to favor the sale of strong drink to our soldiers, who above all classes of our people ought to be protected from the evil effects of intoxicants.

Mr. President, I am opposed on principle to the Government engaging in the liquor traffic, and for this reason, among others,

I favor the proposition that comes from the House of Representatives, and I am opposed to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to correct the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should be glad to have any correction made.

Mr. HAWLEY. He says, as I understood him, that he does not wish the Government to engage in the sale of liquor. I do not know what his phrase was. There is no pretense to sell any strong liquors at all. The sale of beer under the strictest regulations is all that is contemplated here. Distilled spirits and even wine, and all that, are excluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, if the distinguished chairman of the committee had restrained his impetuosity and had done me the honor to listen to me a little further he would have heard a discussion of the beer question. Beer is an intoxicating drink, as every physician in the entire world knows, a drink that does harm to every man who habitually uses it. The committee might just as well have recommended the use of wine as of beer; indeed, I think the drinking of wine is preferable to the drinking of beer, so far as health is concerned.

I notice that in the hearings before the committee it was suggested by the chairman that the name "canteen" is not the proper one, but that the regimental saloon should be known by the name of "post exchange." Well, Mr. President, it matters little what the name is so far as the business remains unchanged.

> That which we call a rose
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

And a saloon is a saloon wherever found or however named.

But it is said that the committee propose to have nothing in the way of liquor sold in the canteen but beer. Now, Mr. President, there is not an intelligent man or woman in the country who does not know that if the sale of beer is permitted in Army camps, stronger liquors will likewise be dispensed. That fact is so patent as not to require discussion. But even if beer is to be the only beverage sold, everybody knows that beer sold under the ægis of the Government will make men drunk just as surely as will wine or distilled spirits when sold by licensed or unlicensed private citizens.

I notice that in the hearing before the committee the Adjutant-General of the Army, in reply to a question, said:

> We regard beer as a nonintoxicant.

Well, Mr. President, some years ago a court, I think in the city of New York, decided that beer was a nonintoxicant, and Artemus Ward concluded that he would put it to a practical test. So he drank freely of beer, and I wish I had the article that Artemus Ward wrote in reference to that matter to read to the Senate to-day.

The great humorist said that after drinking freely of beer he went out on Broadway and the pavement insisted upon flying up and striking him in the face, the lamp-posts were dancing jigs and changing corners, men were staggering around, and everything was in turmoil. His first thought was that he was drunk, but then he knew that that was not the fact, because the court had decided that beer did not intoxicate, and so he concluded that everything and everybody was drunk except Artemus Ward.

Mr. President, every physician in the land knows that beer is intoxicating, and the medical profession is quite united in the opinion that the continued use of it is more detrimental to health than almost any other form of intoxicating drink.

I have here a publication which is a reprint of articles from the Toledo Blade, which contains the testimony of some of the leading physicians of Ohio and elsewhere, some of whom were Army surgeons, in reference to the results of the continued use of beer. I do not propose to take the time of the Senate to read the testimony of these distinguished physicians on this subject, unless it is insisted upon, and if I can get consent to insert their testimony in my remarks without reading, as well as a couple of articles on the subject from the same newspaper, I shall be glad to save the time of the Senate by having the matter disposed of in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

BEER AND THE BODY—TERRIBLE TESTIMONY OF PHYSICIANS AGAINST THIS MONSTROUS EVIL OF THE DAY.

[From the Toledo Blade.]

The alarming growth of the use of beer among our people, and especially the spreading delusion among many who consider themselves temperate and sober that the encouragement of beer drinking is an effective way of promoting the cause of temperance and of aiding to stamp out the demon rum, impelled the Blade to send a representative out to a number of the leading physicians of Toledo to obtain their opinions as to the real damage which indulgence in an appetite for malt liquors does the victim of that form of intemperance, and the dangers which threaten the whole community from a lack of restraint upon this terrible devastator of our people's lives and health, intellect, and bodily vigor, it being indeed a pestilence which literally stalks at noonday throughout the land wherever the poison-breeding breweries are allowed to distribute their broth of degradation and debasement through the community.

Every one is not only a gentleman of the highest personal character, but is a physician whose professional abilities have been severely tested, and have received the stamp of the highest indorsement by the public and their professional brethren. Abler and more skillful physicians are not to be found anywhere. Each has also practiced for many years in Toledo, the shortest time for anyone of them being more than twelve years, and this practice has been of a kind to make them accurately acquainted with the matters of which they speak.

The indictment they with one accord present against beer drinking is simply terrible. It is a curse for which there is no mitigation. The fearful devilfish crushing a fisherman in its long winding arms, and sucking his life blood from his mangled body and limbs, is not so frightful an assailant as this deadly but insidious enemy which fastens itself upon its victim, and daily becomes more and more the wretched man's master, clogging up his liver, rotting his kidneys, decaying his heart and arteries, stupefying and starving his brain, choking his lungs and bronchia, loading his body down with dropsical fluids and unwholesome fat, fastening upon him rheumatism, erysipelas, and all manner of painful and disgusting diseases, and finally dragging him down to the grave at a time when other men are in their prime of mental and bodily vigor. But we can not hope to tell the story so well as the physicians themselves, who speak out of the fullness of a rich experience. Here are their statements:

Dr. S. H. Burgen, a practitioner for over thirty-five years, twenty-eight of which have been in Toledo, says: "I think beer kills quicker than any other kind of liquor. My attention was first called to the insidious effects of beer drinking years ago, when I began examining for a life-insurance company. I passed as unusually good risks five Germans—young business men—who seemed to be in the best of health and to have superb constitutions. In a few years I was amazed to see the whole five drop off, one after another, with what ought to have been mild and easily curable attacks of diseases. On comparing my experience with that of other physicians I found that they were all having similar luck with confirmed beer drinkers, and the incidents of my practice since then have heaped up confirmation upon confirmation.

"The first organ to be attacked is the kidneys; the liver soon sympathizes with them, and then comes, most frequently, dropsy or Bright's disease, both of which are certain to end fatally. Any physician who cares to take the time will tell you that among the dreadful results of habitual beer drinking are lockjaw and erysipelas, and that the beer drinker seems incapable of recovering from the effects of mild disorders and injuries not usually regarded as of a grave character. Pneumonia, pleurisy, fevers, etc., seem to have a first mortgage on him, which they foreclose remorselessly at an early opportunity.

"The beer drinker is much worse off than the whisky drinker. The whisky drinker seems to have more elasticity and reserve power. A whisky drinker will even have delirium tremens and tear everything around him to pieces, but after the fit is gone you will sometimes find good material to work upon, and good management may bring him around all right. But when a beer drinker gets into trouble it seems almost as if you have to re-create the man before you can hope to do anything for him. I have talked this for years, and have already had an abundance of living and dead instances around me to support my opinions."

Dr. S. S. Thorn, a physician of an experience embracing a period of service in the Army, as well as some twenty years' practice in Toledo, said: "Adulterants are not the important thing in my estimation; it is the beer itself. It stupefies and retards his intellection, because it is a narcotic, and cumulative in its effects. For instance, mercurials are cumulative. They gather in the system. A dose of one-sixteenth or one thirty-second of a grain would have no appreciable effect upon the system; but a number of these small doses administered consecutively would soon produce salivation and other destructive results."

"So beer accumulates and gathers certain pernicious agencies in the system until they become very destructive. Every man who drinks beer in any quantity soon begins to load himself with soft, unhealthy fat. This is bad, because it is the result of interference with the natural elimination of deleterious substances. No man, no matter what his constitution, can go on long with his system full of the morbid and dead matter which the kidneys and liver are intended to work off. If you could drop into a little circle of doctors, when they are having a quiet, professional chat over matters and people in the range of their experience, you will hear enough in a few minutes to terrify you as to the work of beer.

"One will say, 'What's become of So-and-so? I haven't seen him around lately.' 'Oh, he's dead.' 'Dead! What was the matter?' 'Beer.' Another will say, 'I've just come from Blank's. I'm afraid it's about my last call on him, poor fellow.' 'What's the trouble?' 'Oh, he's been a regular beer drinker for years.' A third will remark how —— has just gone out like a candle in a draft of wind. 'Beer' is the reason given. And so on, until the half dozen physicians have mentioned perhaps fifty recent cases where apparently strong, hearty men, at a time of life when they should be in their prime, have suddenly dropped into the grave.

"To say they are habitual beer drinkers is a sufficient explanation to any physician. He never asks anything further as to causes. The first effect on the liver is to congest and enlarge it. Then follows a low grade of inflammation and subsequent contraction of the capsules, with the effect of producing what is known in the profession as 'hob-nailed liver' or 'drunkard's liver.' The surface of the organ becomes covered with little lumps that look like nail heads on the soles of shoes. This condition develops dropsy. The congestion of the liver clogs up all the springs of the body and makes all sorts of mental and physical exertion as difficult and labored as it would be to run a clock, the wheels of which were covered with dirt and gum. The life-insurance companies make a business of estimating men's lives and can only make money by making correct estimates of whatever influences life.

"Here is the table that they use in calculating how long a normal, healthy man will probably live after a given age:

Age.	Expectation.
20 years	41.5 years
30 years	34.4 years
40 years	28.3 years
50 years	20.2 years
60 years	13.8 years
65 years	11 years

"Now, they expect that a man otherwise healthy, who is addicted to beer drinking, will have his life shortened from 40 to 60 per cent. For instance, if he is 20 years old and does not drink beer he may reasonably expect to reach the age of 61. If he is a beer drinker, he will probably not live to be over 35, and so on. If he is 30 years old when he begins to drink beer, he will probably drop off somewhere between 40 and 45, instead of living to 64, as he should. There is no sentiment, prejudice, or assertion about these figures. They are simply cold-blooded business facts, derived from experience, and the companies invest their money upon them just the same as a man pays so many dollars for so many feet of ground or bushels of wheat.

"All beer drinkers have rheumatism, more or less, and no beer drinker can recover from rheumatism as long as he drinks beer. You will notice how a beer drinker walks about stiff on his heels, without any of the natural elasticity and spring from the toes and ball of the foot that a healthy man should have. That is because the beer has the effect of increasing the lithia deposits—'chalk stones' they are sometimes called—about the smaller joints, which cause articular rheumatism. Beer drinkers are absolutely the most dangerous class of subjects that a surgeon can operate upon. Every surgeon dreads to have anything to do with them. They do not recover from the simplest hurts without a great deal of trouble and danger.

"Insignificant scratches and cuts are liable to develop a long train of dangerous troubles. The choking up of the sewers and absorbents of the body brings about blood poisoning and malignant running sores, and sometimes delirium tremens results from a small hurt. It is very dangerous for a beer drinker to even cut his finger. No wound ever heals by "first intention," as it does upon a healthy man, but takes a long course of suppuration, sometimes with very offensive discharges, and all sorts of complications are liable. All surgeons hesitate to perform operations on a beer drinker that they would undertake with the greatest confidence on anyone else. I have told you the frozen truth—cold, calm, scientific facts, such as the profession everywhere recognizes as absolute truths. I do not regard beer drinking as safe for anyone. It is a dangerous, aggressive evil that no one can tamper with with any safety to himself. There is only one safe course, and that is to let it alone entirely."

Dr. M. H. Parmalee, physician and surgeon of twelve years' practice in Toledo, says: "The majority of saloon keepers die from dropsy, arising from liver and kidney diseases, which are induced by their beer drinking. My experience has been that saloon keepers and the men working about breweries are very liable to these diseases. When one of these apparently stalwart, beery fellows is attacked by a disorder that would not be regarded as at all dangerous in a person of ordinary constitution, or even a delicate, weakly child or woman, he is liable to drop off like an overripe apple from a tree. You are never sure of him for a minute. He may not be dangerously sick to-day and to-morrow be in his shroud.

"All physicians think about alike on this subject, as their observations all lead them to similar conclusions. It is a matter so plain that there is hardly room for any other opinion. The most of them are like myself in another thing: I have come to dread being called upon to take charge of a case of sickness in a man who is an habitual beer drinker. Experience has taught me that in such persons it is impossible to predict the outcome. The form of Bright's disease known as the swollen or large white kidney is much more frequent among beer drinkers than any other class of people, and also that its prevalence seems to have kept pretty fair pace with the rapid increase in the consumption of beer in this country."

Dr. W. T. Ridenour served during the war as surgeon of the Twelfth Ohio Infantry, was medical inspector of the Department of West Virginia, has resided in Toledo for fourteen years, has served some years as health officer of the city, and has been lecturer on physiology in the Toledo medical schools for three years. The following is his testimony:

"The first effect of the habitual use of beer is upon the stomach, merely a physical one, and is to greatly distend it."

"In making a post-mortem examination a physician instantly recognized a beer drinker's stomach by its greatly increased dimensions. The liver is the great laboratory, the great workshop of the body. Any derangement of it means the immediate derangement of all the rest of the vital machinery. There can be no health anywhere when the liver is out of order. Beer drinking overloads it and clogs it up, producing congestion. The liver is composed of a number of little cells united together into what are called lobules. When the beer drinker begins to overload his liver, the first effort of nature is to enlarge it to do the extra work it is called upon to do. But this enlargement is mainly in the interstitial tissue, the tissue connecting the cells and lobules, which keeps on growing until the cells themselves are diminished in size by pressure, and less fitted for their office. This deranges and permanently cripples the organ.

"One of the functions of the liver is to separate from the blood excrementitious and effete substances that should be thrown off through the kidneys in the urine. Naturally, when the working capacity of the liver is crippled, this function of preparing the excrementitious matters for elimination by the kidneys is interfered with, the salts—urea and the urates—are imperfectly elaborated, and much of them is thrown into the blood and kidneys as uric acid, which is comparatively insoluble and very irritating to those organs, and produces a long train of harmful sequelæ. Later the kidneys are assailed. I have no doubt that the rapid spread of that terrible ailment, Bright's disease of the kidneys, is largely due to the great development of the beer-drinking habit in this country.

"I have always believed that Bayard Taylor fell a victim to the German beer that he praised so highly. He died of Bright's disease at 50, when he was comparatively young, and should have lived, with his constitution, to a green old age. He did not want to die, either. He was full of ambition, and had much work that he was eager to do before he passed away. But he went, just as habitual beer drinkers are going all the time and everywhere. My first patient was a saloon keeper on Cherry street, as fine a looking man physically as I had ever seen—tall, well built, about 35 years old, with clear eyes, florid complexion, and muscles well developed. He had an attack of pneumonia in the lower lobe of the right lung.

"It was a simple, well-defined case attack, which I regarded very hopefully. Doctors are confident of saving nineteen out of twenty of such cases. They will, in fact, usually cure themselves in a little while, if left alone, as the disease is regarded as a self-limited one, with tendency to recovery. I told my partner—Dr. Trembly—so, when we spoke of it in the evening. To my surprise he said quietly, 'He'll die.' I asked what made him think so. 'He's a beer-drinker,' answered Trembly, and he persisted in predicting a fatal termination of the case in spite of all my assertions to the contrary. My confidence seemed justified when my patient began to recover from the attack on the lower lobe. Suddenly I discovered that the disease had lighted up in the middle lobe.

"This did not go through the various stages of the disease toward convalescence, but passed into the third stage of pneumonia suppuration; then the upper lobe became involved, and finally it crossed over and attacked the other lung, and my patient succumbed. Beer drinkers are peculiarly liable to die of pneumonia. Their vital power, their power of resistance, their vis medicatrix naturæ, is so lowered by their habits that they are liable to drop off from any acute disease, such as fevers, pneumonia, etc. As a rule, when a confirmed beer drinker takes pneumonia he dies. They make bad patients.

"Beer drinking produces rheumatism by producing chronic congestion and ultimately degeneration of the liver, thus interfering with its functions, among others its metabolic function, by which the food is elaborated and fitted for the sustenance of the body, and by which function the refuse materials resulting from the nutrition and action of the tissues of the body are oxidized and made soluble for elimination by the kidneys, as before stated, thus forcing the retention in the body of the excrementitious and dead matters I have spoken of. The presence of uric acid and other insoluble effete matters in the blood and tissues is one of the main causes of rheumatism, and I have shown how beer drinking retains it in the system."

Dr. J. H. Curry, whose specialty is diseases of the eye and ear, and who is a successful practitioner of many years' standing, declined to discuss the general physiological effects of beer and other intoxicants. "I can not say that I know any strictly beer drinkers. No matter what they have begun upon, all the drinkers that I know now drink whisky about as regularly as they do beer, and also wine when they can afford it. They have all progressed pretty rapidly from beer to something stronger, which they alternate with beer. A man can go on a spree once a year, or once in six months or so, without doing himself any material injury, but a man who drinks what he calls 'moderately' every day lowers his vital powers very much by the practice.

"This is universally conceded by the profession. He is especially unable to stand any shock or strain to his system, and breaks down under what would not seriously affect nondrinkers. The habitual moderate drinker saturates his system, injures his bodily fiber, and loads it up with noxious matters that are very injurious. The fact of a man being an habitual drinker is always regarded as a very bad factor by every physician and surgeon in making a prognosis of his case. Medical men dread having such for patients. Oculists have to contend with a disease that has been named 'amblyopia potatorum,' or drunkard's blindness, which actually manifests itself as an atrophy of the optic nerve—a wasting away from want of nourishment. When this proceeds to a certain stage in the optic nerve the result is total and incurable blindness."

Soelberg Wells, one of the first authorities on eye diseases, says on amblyopia potatorum: "This toxic effect may be especially produced by alcohol, tobacco, lead, and quinine. The amblyopia met with in drunkards (amblyopia potatorum) generally commences with the appearance of a mist or cloud before the eyes, which more or less surrounds and shrouds the object, rendering it hazy and indistinct. In some cases the impairment of vision becomes very considerable, so that only the largest of print can be deciphered; but if progressive amblyopia sets in, the sight may be completely lost."

"Stellwagen on the Eye," another author of the highest repute among physicians, says: "By the complete giving up of alcoholics the disease may be brought to a standstill and often cured. Of this we are certain—that amblyopia is observed in an extremely large percentage of habitual drinkers."

"Noyes on the Eye," the largest publication in this specialty says: "In alcoholic amblyopia we usually find a dull red nerve, with swollen veins, rather hazy borders, and torpid circulation. Atrophy may subsequently ensue."

Dr. S. S. Lungren, one of the leading homeopathic physicians and surgeons in the country, has been practicing in Toledo for nearly a quarter of a century: "It is difficult to find any part of a confirmed beer drinker's machinery that is doing its work as it should. This is the reason why their life cords snap off like glass rods when disease or accident gives them a little blow. Beer drinking shortens life. That is not a mere opinion, however; it is a well-settled, recognized fact. Physicians and insurance companies accept this as unquestioningly as they do any other undisputed fact of science. The great English physicians decide that the heart's action is increased 13 per cent in its efforts to throw off an alcoholic stimulant introduced into the circulation. The result of this is easily figured out.

"The natural pulsebeat is, say, 76 per minute. If we multiply this by 60 for the number of minutes in an hour, and by 24 for the hours in a day, and add 13 per cent to the sum total, we will find that the heart has been compelled to do an extra work during that time in throwing off the burden of a few drinks (4.8 ounces of alcohol) equal to 15½ tons lifted 1 foot high. The alcohol in the beer causes a dilation of the superficial blood vessels, as it does of all of them, in fact. This gives the ruddy look. But it is really an unhealthy congestion there and everywhere. Everywhere—heart, brain, stomach, lungs, liver, kidneys—it breaks down, weakens, enfeebles, invites attacks of disease, and makes recovery from any attack or injury precarious and difficult.

"The brain and its membranes suffer severely, and after irritation and inflammation come the well-known dullness and stupidity. There is no question in my mind that many brain diseases and many cases of insanity are produced by excessive beer drinking. But it is everywhere the same, everywhere it is degeneration; and this ruinous work is not confined to the notorious drinkers, but everyone must suffer just in proportion to the amount he or she drinks. No man who drinks much beer is the physical and mental equal of one who abstains. He diminishes his present powers, shortens his life, and wrecks himself by his indulgence in it."

Dr. J. T. Woods, three years in the United States service as surgeon in charge of important brigade and division hospitals, five years professor of physiology in the Cleveland Medical College, now chief surgeon of the Wabash system of railroads, has practiced in Toledo sixteen years. He says: "I have never had reason to think that any beneficial results came from the use of beer as a common drink, but, on the contrary, it is slowly but positively detrimental to the system. Its indiscriminate use as a beverage produces the most damaging effects, as other drugs would do. I can conceive of no greater fallacy than that any active medicine can, even in small quantities, be used with impunity. It does not follow because we can not measure results that there are none. That beer is foreign to nature's demand is plainly evident.

"The whole organism at once sets about its removal. Every channel through which it can be got rid of is brought into active play and does not cease its efforts until the last trace is gone. The reaching of a certain end depends only on the frequency of the repetitions. The whole is made up of the parts; each and every drink counts one. These 'ones' added together make the wreck, and to secure this result it is only necessary to make the single numbers sufficient. I do not see how to excuse anyone from its effects. In short, each leaves its footprint in one way or another, and the idea that because you stop before you stagger the system takes no note of the damaging material you put into it is a ruinous delusion.

"The condition of the habitual drinker is considered as an unnatural one, a portion of his diet having been such that vital organs are more or less impaired, the nervous system in a peculiarly unreliable condition, blood deranged in quality, and the reparative power below what it would naturally be. Treatment before and after any severe operative procedure is conducted with especial view to this unnatural or fictitious life, experience having long since taught this fact in the face of all contrary theory. That confirmed beer drinkers are especially unpromising patients all practical surgeons will agree. There can be no question about it."

Dr. C. A. Kirkley, in constant practice in Toledo for fifteen years, says: "I do not believe that the healthy organism needs an artificial prop to sustain it. Depression below the standard of health always follows just in proportion as the system is stimulated above that standard, and its effect upon nutrition, upon the nervous system, and upon the circulation must therefore be injurious. The organs directly affected are the stomach, liver, kidneys, heart, and brain. Stimulants are so quickly absorbed that their action is perhaps especially exercised upon, first, the vascular system, then the nervous system, and then upon the nutrition.

"What is called the portal vein conveys the stimulants through the liver, after it is absorbed, the function and structure of which is liable to suffer. This is also true of the kidneys, which naturally eliminate such extraneous matters. As is well known, there is no more fruitful source of Bright's disease. The heart and blood vessels are excited at first, then their tone is impaired, and then digestion and nutrition become impaired. The nervous system is of course especially liable to disorder. Every physician is familiar with cases in which nervous 'wear and tear' in an active life has been kept up by stimulants without apparent loss of power for years; bodily and mental vigor, however, suddenly fail, mental exertion produces fatigue, there is depression, loss of appetite, enfeebled digestion, and all the symptoms consequent upon this condition.

"The individual has believed that he could keep up his strength for a longer time with the assistance of stimulants. He has been constantly overtaxed, but his delusion is to the contrary. The repeated application of the stimulus that the over-exertion might be prolonged has really expended the powers of the nervous system and prepared him for more complete prostration later in life. The temporary advantage gained was purchased at a great cost. The greater the expenditure of nervous power by the use of stimulants, the more complete the exhaustion.

"The tired brain, from habitual overwork, may feel the consequences less speedily when kept up by artificial stimulation to extraordinary activity, and the stomach may perhaps be less susceptible to the loss of its natural energy; but when the crisis comes there is poor repair of nervous matter, the nutritive powers are depressed, and the health slowly restored, if at all. On the other hand, the man who has abstained from the use of alcoholic beverages, having overtaxed his nervous system, only needs a short period of rest and change for the renovation of his system and the recovery of mental and bodily vigor. My experience is that sickness is always more complicated—more fatal—in beer drinkers, and that serious accidents are usually fatal with them. The rate of mortality among life-policy holders is much lower than among the average population, owing to the fact that those of intemperate habits are rejected.

"The effect of alcoholic and malt liquors in producing disease and predisposing to it is perhaps greatest in tropical countries. As a general rule, the more unhealthy the locality the more do the inhabitants indulge in stimulants, either from the mistaken notion that they can better withstand the effects of the climate or a disposition to make their short life a jolly one. Under its influence the mental powers are even more inactive than the physical. There is hardly a single cause that operates more powerfully in the production of insanity, and not only that, but it excites the action of other causes that may be present. Plutarch says that 'one drunkard begets another,' and Aristotle says that 'drunken women bring forth children like unto themselves.' A report was made to the legislature of Massachusetts some years ago, I think by Dr. Howe, on idiocy. He had learned the habits of the parents of 300 idiots, and 145—nearly half—are reported as known to be habitual drunkards, thus showing the enfeebled constitution of the children of drunkards.

"I have in mind an instance where children born to the mother, begotten when the father was intoxicated, and all died within eight months of their birth. They should have recovered and would have recovered had they not had the relaxed and enfeebled constitution inherited from their intemperate father. Instances are recorded where both parents were intoxicated at the time of conception, and the result was an idiot. There is not a doubt but that inebriety not only makes more destructive whatever taint may exist, but impairs the health and natural vigor for remote generations. I believe that forty-nine out of fifty cases of chronic Bright's disease are directly produced by it. I have never met with a case in which the patient has not been intemperate to a greater or less degree. The proportion may be too high, but that is certainly my experience. Mr. Christison, a celebrated author, states that three-fourths to four-fifths of the cases met with in Edinburgh were in habitual drunkenness."

Dr. W. C. Chapman served during the war as a surgeon in the Army of the Potomac, and since then has practiced in Toledo. He is professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the Northwestern Ohio Medical College. He says: "Alcohol is a cerebral sedative—that is, an agent which, having first stimulated the brain and nervous system to an abnormal degree, causes sedation, an exactly opposite condition. It matters not in what form the alcohol is taken, whether as whisky, brandy, wine, or beer, this physiological effect is always shown as the principal one.

"There are other results from its use, which, although perfectly well established and understood by the physiologist, remain unknown to the drinker, as the condensation of albumen, congestion of the stomach and liver, thus impairing digestion, and even causing structural changes in the various organs themselves; causing enlargements, followed by contractions of the liver, fatty degeneration of the blood, the blood vessels, heart, and kidneys, and the brain itself may be similarly affected. Of course, small doses, not frequently repeated, do not bring about all these results, but sooner or later, if drinking to moderation becomes a habit, many of these results will become apparent.

"I certainly do consider beer as harmful as the ardent spirits, if not more so. I can not see how anyone can drink from 10 to 20 glasses of beer a day, an amount quite low for a beer drinker, without producing pathological conditions fully as grave as those found in one who constantly drinks his brandy or whisky. I know that some good men consider beer is a food, and even alcohol, but I can not so look at it. The fact is, that after very many experiments it is supposed that about one and a half ounces of alcohol will be retained during twenty-four hours in the system, and that more than that will be excreted.

"Therefore within that limit alcohol acts as a food. Making allowance for collecting all the excreta during twenty-four or forty-eight hours, what a narrow limit do we find for its use as food. Hence, by the drinking of 1½ ounces of alcohol as much nourishment would be obtained as from 3 cents' worth of sugar candy. And even the most enthusiastic of its supporters as food say that no matter how much is taken during twenty-four hours only 1½ ounces is retained, and more than that is injurious. Just look at it. Pure beer is 91 per cent water, 5 per cent alcohol, and 4 per cent of malt extract, adulteration, hops, etc. Not as much nutriment in 10 pints of beer as in one slice of bread and butter."

Dr. G. A. Collamore, in practice about twenty-five years and formerly division surgeon of the Third Division, Twenty-second Army Corps, said:

"Beer contains from 3 to 5 per cent of alcohol and produces the well-known effects of that substance on the vital organs, especially the brain, stomach, liver, kidneys, and blood.

"The brain is kept in a hyperemic or congested condition, which prevents normal cerebration or the accurate use of the mental faculties.

"The stomach becomes catarrhal, inactive, and finally dilated.

"The liver is overburdened in disposing of the excess of hydrocarbon, is first congested, then contracted or cirrhotic, which condition partially stops the free circulation of blood through it and leads to abdominal dropsy.

"The kidneys are overworked to get rid of the superfluous water, and become first enlarged and then contracted (Bright's disease), a state of things which results in enlargement of the heart (hypertrophy), derangement of the circulation, and, eventually, general dropsy.

"The lungs have an extra amount of labor thrown upon them in burning up or oxidizing the alcohol, and are in a favorable condition for attacks of congestion, inflammation, or œdema (dropsy), which are very liable to prove fatal.

"Every physician and surgeon will testify that, other things being equal, the beer soaker has a much smaller chance of recovery, if overtaken by serious illness, accident, or the necessity of surgical interference, than the one who abstains. In this one particular effect beer is, in my judgment, more injurious than more concentrated forms of alcohol, which tend rather to local disorders."

Dr. Andrew McFarland writes thus: "It is your stout old hero, who goes to bed every night with liquor enough under his belt to fuddle the brains of a half dozen ordinary men, and yet lives out his threescore years and ten, that will be found at the head of the stock that pour into the world, generation after generation, such a crop of lunatics, epileptics, eccentrics, and inebriates as we often see. The impunity with which one so constituted will violate all physical law, gets its set-off in a succeeding generation, when the great harvest begins."

"That 'the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children;' that 'the fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth have been set on edge,' are truths that no Scripture is needed to teach. In other words, he who sins through physical excess does not do half the harm to himself that he does to the inheritors of his blood. The penalty must be paid as surely as there is a seedtime and a harvest."

The President of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—one of the oldest in the country—has for years been investigating the relation of beer drinking to longevity. His object was that he might solve the problem whether beer promotes vitality or otherwise. In other words, to know whether beer drinkers are desirable risks to a life insurance company. We give his conclusions:

He declared, as the result of a series of observations carried on among a selected group of persons who were habitual drinkers of beer, that although for two or three years there was nothing remarkable, yet presently death began to strike, and then the mortality became astounding and uniform in its manifestations. There was no mistaking it; the history was almost invariable; robust, apparent health, full muscles, a fair outside, increasing weight, florid faces; then a touch of cold or a sniff of malaria, and instantly some acute disease, with almost invariable typhoid symptoms, was in violent action, and ten days or less ended it.

It was as if the system had been kept fair on the outside, while within it was eaten to a shell, and at the first touch of disease there was utter collapse, every fiber was poisoned and weak. And this in its main features, varying in degree, has been his observation in beer drinking everywhere. It is peculiarly deceptive at first; it is thoroughly destructive at the last.

THE LETTER OF AN INDIGNANT BREWER AND AN ANSWER THERETO.

THE BREWER TO THE BLADE.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., January 29, 1884.

To the Editor of the Toledo Blade:

I protest against your indiscriminate denunciation of the trade in liquors, more especially of those engaged in brewing. Brewing is as legitimate a business as any other, and is conducted upon precisely the same principles. There is a demand for beer, and we, the brewers, supply it. There are, of course, good men in the business and bad men. I have been in the business twenty years, and consider myself doing just as legitimate work as though I was selling flour or boots and shoes. No one need drink whisky or beer unless he wants to, any more than he is compelled to eat bread, against his will. This is a free country, but you and those like you would make us worse than slaves by dictating to the people what they shall eat and drink. My business is just as legitimate as yours.

A BREWER.

THE BLADE TO THE BREWER.

You are not the only brewer who has written us in this strain. Every brewer holds his business to be legitimate, and they all base the claim upon the assertion that a man may drink alcoholic stimulants or let them alone, as he elects, and that if any harm grows out of the traffic the fault lies with the consumer and not with the producer.

There never was a statement so utterly foundationless. You know that as the business is now conducted you are not uttering truth. Twenty years ago it would have been partly true, but not now. Twenty years ago the brewing of beer was in its infancy, and the beer shop existed only where there was a demand for beer. It was then a passive nuisance, not an aggressive evil. The snake was then lying quietly, waiting for people to come to be bitten. It was not skirmishing around searching for people to bite.

But when the enormous profits of brewing came to be known, when men hungering for money saw there was a net profit of from $1 to $2 on every barrel sold, capital and business capacity were put into it, and the style of conducting the business was changed entirely.

When you went into the business you did not wait for a demand for your stuff, but you set about creating a demand. And you went about your work cleverly. You established beer shops where there had never been a call for them, and you proceeded with an ingenuity that was devilish and a persistency that was infernal to make customers for your product. You laid traps for the people. You took houses and rooms everywhere and put into them men fitted by nature for the business, and made it to their profit to entice men and boys into your places to be taught to drink beer.

The number whose stomachs were already trained to the liquid were altogether too few for your purpose, and you began a regular systematic recruiting of the ranks of drunkards, which you have faithfully followed ever since, your success in this nefarious trade increasing with the money you make by it.

You understood enough of the make-up of the human system to know that when a boy was once accustomed to drink a stoppage was almost impossible, and that when his stomach was once sufficiently inflamed he would go on so long as he had energy enough to earn the price of a glass and the strength to lift it to his lips, giving you a mortgage upon him till the certain end came to him.

Basing your business upon this physical law, you used every device that cupidity could suggest to entice men and boys into your places. You encouraged the playing of games, the stakes being always beer, to the end that winner and loser should both drink, whether they wanted to or not. You encouraged the pernicious system of treating, that the man who came in intending to take one glass should take a dozen, provided enough of his friends were present, and you went so far as to set upon your counters free lunches, always of material that was thirst provoking, and prepared solely to keep the infernal stream running.

In short, instead of nursing an evil which people might come to, you have gone out to thrust it upon them. There being a profit so enormous on beer, you have lain awake nights to devise ways and means to sell the largest amount of it possible.

Yours is the cunningest scheme ever invented for the making of money. The youth once initiated into the habit is its bondslave forever, unless saved by a miracle. You can count your gains with a certainty by estimating the earnings of your customers. All you want to gain wealth is to have customers enough, and your principal business is to make customers. Once made, you need never look after them. They are as certain to come to you as the sun is to rise, and you and your guild are just as busy making customers as you are making the beer to supply them.

Do not try to escape the responsibility of this systematic drunkard making by claiming that it is the work of the beer seller and not the beer maker. That will not do. You own the fixtures in these saloons; you selected the fellow who stands behind the bar, and if he does not sell so much beer each day the place is taken from him. You have scores of such places in Milwaukee. You have established them in the same way all over the country, and you are looking for more. You not only splotched your own city all over with these hell holes, but you went out into the towns and villages of your own and other States to establish them. Wherever a beer shop was not, you planted one, each one a missionary of the devil. It is a part of the contract by which the poor devil holds his place that he shall make his canvass for drunkards thorough. Your hand does not strike the blow, but it guides the hand that does.

You are unwise to institute a comparison between the business of beer and flour. Your business is not as legitimate as dealing in flour, because it is not true, and never was, of you or any other man, that one can drink and let it alone as he chooses. You know, or ought to, that every drop of your stuff that goes into a man's stomach diseases it, and creates an irresistible craving for more. You know that every drop taken lessens the power to resist, and that this sapping of the will power goes on steadily and irresistibly till the victim of it is entirely incapable of turning from it; that he becomes so helpless in the grasp of the appetite that he will steal his baby's shoes to get the means to gratify it.

To commence is to continue, and you induce the commencing. Your comparison is very unfortunate. No man eats bread to the point of congesting his liver and enlarging his kidneys, nor can there be an appetite for bread which requires excess to satisfy it. Bread does not create a diseased stomach which can only be satisfied with bread, and even if it did the glutton can only injure himself. Men do not get crazy upon bread, nor do they commit murder under its effects. No man ever starved or froze his family to get bread for himself. Bread is strength; beer is weakness.

Any business that is based upon a canvass for drunkards, that has for its foundation not only the supply of drink to drunkards, but the conversion of sober men into drunkards, is not legitimate. Your business is not only not legitimate, but it is a curse to every business that is. Every dime you take from your victims is just that much robbed from the grocer, the shoemaker, the butcher, the baker, and the dry-goods merchant. It is that much taken from the wealth of the world and worse than wasted, for it not only goes for nothing, but it destroys the power of production in the man using it. It is a robbery of the community in a double sense. You are not only absorbing the proceeds of labor, but you are destroying labor itself. The drunkard not only does not consume, but, under your manipulation, he ceases to produce. Your use of him ends with his incapacity for labor; and after you have deprived him of the power to labor you turn him and those dependent upon him over to the general public to support, and look about for new paupers to take his place.

There are degrees in badness as in goodness, and there are, doubtless, honest men making and dealing in liquor. But you know very well that every prostitute in Milwaukee bases her business upon alcoholic stimulants. You know that beer is the one staple in every thieves' den in your city. You know that every gambler depends upon liquor as his mainstay. You know that wherever crime and degradation are, liquor is, and that it is always first in the procession. There may be liquor without crime, but there is no crime without liquor. It is father of murder, the twin brother of every species of crime, and the parent of every kind of evil. It stupefies the victim of the dives in your bad quarters and nerves the arm of the ruffian who kills him. It is the chief dependence of the pimp and prostitute and the invariable help of the gambler and thief.

You claim to be a respectable brewer. Do not your wagons stop regularly in front of these low dives? Do you not supply the gambling hells and houses of prostitution the same as you do the "respectable" places? Do not your agents canvass these places for business, and when one of them is established is it not a foot race between you and your competitors to secure the trade? And you know perfectly well to what uses your beer is to be put.

The business of manufacturing and selling anything in which there is absolutely no good and which is confessedly bad can not be properly counted as legitimate. Whoever embarks in such a business does it because he so loves the almighty dollar that he is willing to part with the respect of good men and women and for its sake set at defiance the opinion of the world. Every drop brewed is a curse, and no one on earth knows it better than you. You may drink it yourself, but we venture to say you do not do it to any greater extent than is necessary for the good of your trade. You would not have your son drink it, and you would not marry your daughter to a man addicted to it.

To say that the public, which has the legal right to kill mad dogs, and restrain criminality, and all that sort of thing, has not the right to bring you under the control of law, is absurdity itself. To say that the law, which has the power to restrain the criminal, shall not restrain the criminal maker is worse than absurd. The community has the right to protect itself, and we know of nothing that calls for more stringent work in the way of self-protection than the saving of men and boys from you and those in your business.

When the public conscience is sufficiently aroused, when the ghastly list of those who have gone down to death through you and your lieutenants is a little longer, your business will not be regulated and restrained, but utterly destroyed. This will be the first step the people will take.

BEER.

We devote much space in this issue to the statements of the best physicians and surgeons of Toledo as to the effect of beer upon the human system.

We ask for it a careful and critical perusal. The statements are of all classes of physicians. We have not selected those of known temperance principles, but have taken all. What they say of beer is not colored by any feeling for or against temperance. Their statements are the cold, bare experiences of men of science who know whereof they speak.

It should be borne in mind that Toledo is essentially a beer-drinking city. The German population is very large; there are five of the largest and most extensive breweries in the country here, and there is probably more beer drank, in proportion to the population, than in any city in the United States.

The practice of these physicians is, therefore, largely among the beer drinkers, and they have had abundant opportunities to know exactly its bearing upon health and disease.

Every one of them bears testimony to the fact that no man can drink beer safely, that it is an injury to anyone who uses it in any quantity, and that its effect upon the general health of the country has been even worse than that of whisky.

We know that it has been, for one reason, if for no other. It has entered the field of drunkard making under false pretenses. It was accepted by many as a safe substitute for whisky, and thousands favored its use on that ground, forgetting that it is an alcoholic beverage the same as whisky, and that whoever uses alcohol as a stimulant must have the amount of alcohol that is necessary to produce the effect desired, and, so far as effect is concerned, it does not make a particle of difference whether that alcohol is in the form of beer, wine, or whisky, because every drinking man will take what alcohol he wants into his system to produce the desired effect.

To reduce it to plain English, men drink to get whatever degree of drunkenness they desire. There is drunk in beer the same as any other liquor. Beer is from 8 to 12 per cent alcohol. If an ounce of alcohol is what is required to produce the desired effect upon a man, he may get it in four drinks of whisky, while it would require a gallon of beer to produce the same effect. If he craves the ounce of alcohol, and seeks for it in beer, he is going to drink the gallon, thus not only getting the same amount of alcohol, but loading his stomach with a gallon of fluid charged with all sorts of unhealthy principles. Thousands upon thousands of confirmed drunkards have been made by beer because it has been held that it could be indulged in safely.

There is no safety in alcohol. When a man says, "Oh, I drink nothing—I take a glass of beer now and then," that man is fairly on the road. Better for him the naked fact of undisguised whisky.

We especially call attention to another fact. Life-insurance companies have no sentiment. They are as cold-blooded as banks. They do business upon strictly business principles. Their business is one based purely upon experience, from which certain inexorable rules have been established. A life-insurance company will not insure the life of a confirmed beer drinker. Why? Because it is a certain fact, as certain as anything can be, that the beer drinker can not live long enough to make insurance profitable to them.

The "expectation" of life in a beer drinker is cut short by his appetite. No life-insurance company is going to take a risk upon a body into which is being poured every day the seeds of disease, any more than a marine insurance company is going to take a risk upon a rotten hulk. No life-insurance company is going to take a risk upon a man who is inviting Bright's disease of the kidneys, inflammatory rheumatism, congestion of the liver, and enlargement of the kidneys, all of which are as certain to come to him as he is to persevere in beer. And the beer drinker, as a rule, does persevere till death stops his contributions to brewers.

These institutions dread beer more than they do whisky, for its effect upon the system is even worse. A nonbeer drinker at 40 is considered a good risk—a beer drinker at that age can get no insurance at all. As we said, there is no sentiment in life insurance companies. They act entirely upon facts, which are the result of experience. Their figures never lie.

One other fact we desire to call attention to while we are about it. There are degrees in beer. Much more beer may be drank without death in Germany than in America, for one reason. In Germany the brewers are under government control, and here they are not. Beer in Germany has to be made of malt and hops only; here it may be made of anything that the brewer chooses. He may use any poison in it that his cupidity suggests. There is a very great percentage of them who would use strychnine if it would lessen the cost of beer.

Then, again, in Germany beer is kept till it is sound. It is not exposed for sale until it has undergone all its fermentation and is as harmless as any alcoholic liquor can be. It is not so in this country. The rate of interest makes it an object to turn beer into money as soon as possible, and, therefore, beer made Monday is sold Saturday, with the yeast not half worked off, and in a condition to undergo fermentation in the stomach of the drinker. Then beer made and sold in this country, were it pure, is altogether too new for even the confirmed beer drinker. It is bad enough at best; as we get it, it is worse than vile.

We especially ask every man who indulges in this most vile decoction to read most carefully what the best physicians and surgeons in the country say about it. They know, and their evidence is perfectly safe. It is science speaking through its devotees.

Mr. GALLINGER. The celebrated Dr. N. S. Davis, of Chicago, in a critical discussion of the influence of alcohol on the human system, has something to say concerning beer. Dr. Davis is doubtless well known by reputation to many members of this body. He is one of the most distinguished physicians in this country. I am not quite sure whether Dr. Davis is alive at the present time, but his writings on scientific subjects attracted the attention of the entire country, and especially of the medical profession. Dr. Davis says:

Accurate investigation will show that beer and wine drinkers consume more alcohol per man than spirit drinkers; and while they are not as often openly intoxicated, they suffer fully as much from disease and premature death in the aggregate as do those who use distilled spirits.

Again, the beer drinker drinks more nearly every day, and thereby keeps some alcohol in his blood more constantly, while a large percentage of spirit drinkers drink only periodically, leaving considerable intervals of abstinence, during which the tissues regain nearly their natural condition. The more constant and persistent is the presence of alcohol in the blood and the tissues, even in moderate quantity, the more certainly does it lead to perverted and degenerative changes in the tissues, ending in renal and hepatic dropsies, cardiac failures, gout, apoplexy, and paralysis.

The testimony that the use of any form of alcohol has a deleterious effect on armies as well as individuals is overwhelming. A recent publication by Dr. Winfield S. Hall, professor of physiology in the Northwestern University Medical School of Chicago, a graduate of the Leipsic University, completely disproves the argument that beer is a food, or that it in any way builds up and invigorates the system.

I have here a publication, the author of which is Henry T. Hewes, A. B., M. D. (Harvard), teacher in physiological and clinical chemistry, Harvard University Medical School, of Boston, in which Dr. Hewes, one of the most eminent scientists of New England, discusses the question as to the use of alcohol by soldiers and the effect it has upon them—not the temporary effect, not the effect for an hour or possibly a day, but the effect it has upon them as an army in the matter of their being able to endure the hardships that necessarily come to soldiers. I apprehended that the Senate might not patiently listen to the reading of an extract from this interesting book, but the Senator from Colorado suggests to me that there are some Senators who would listen to it, and for that reason I will venture to read one extract. Dr. Hewes says:

In the British army in Africa, for instance, the experiment was tried of testing how far the soldiers could march when taking daily what were considered moderate amounts of rum, and then how far they could march when taking no liquor, and comparing the records. So also in the Army of the Potomac, in the American civil war, the same experiment was tried with whisky. When the records are compared it is found that soldiers can endure longer marches when taking no liquor than when allowed their daily portion. These and other experiments of the same nature thus demonstrate that alcohol has the effect of diminishing the capacity of a man for muscular work, even when the alcohol is taken in what are generally considered as moderate amounts. From these results we are justified in concluding that the drinking of alcoholic liquors, even in so-called moderation, is a bad practice for anyone who wishes to do hard work or endure sustained exertion.

This knowledge is a direct contradiction to the common idea that a glass of liquor increases the power to work. If the poor man were aware of this harmful effect of liquor, it would keep him in many instances from spending for a glass of beer or ale or whisky the money which should be spent for strength-giving foods, such as bread or meat.

In skill and accuracy, and in the direction and expenditure of energy, the man who has taken no alcohol has a great advantage over the man who has. He is more calm in an emergency, and can judge better how to make his strength most effective. This effect of alcohol was remarkably demonstrated in the naval battle off Santiago, in the recent Spanish-American war, in the incapacity of marksmanship shown by the Spanish gunners, who were given alcoholic drinks under the false idea that it would "fortify" them for their work.

I will now introduce two interesting extracts, one from the Journal of the American Medical Association, and the other from Dr. Bienfait, of Liege. The extracts are as follows:

The attention of the civilized world has been called to the conspicuous fact of the accuracy of the firing of the gunners on our battleships in the recent war with Spain. The contrast between the firing of the men of our Navy and that of Spain was due in part, no doubt, to the custom that prevails on the ships of the latter, where daily rations of grog are given at all times, and when an action is going on or anticipated double rations of grog are furnished to the men, while since 1862, when that custom was abolished by our Government, no rations of liquor are allowed at any time on board our ships. The custom just alluded to as followed by Spain is true of all the navies of the world but ours. Yet Great Britain has abandoned the double rations of grog when a fight is on, and then no liquor is allowed, but in place of it supplies of water and oatmeal are arranged all over the ship to satisfy the thirst resulting from the heat, exertion, and smoke, inseparable from a naval combat. (The Journal of the Amer. Med. Asso., January, 1899, p. 174.)

It is said that a desire to excel in athletic sport has led clubs of students at some of the German universities to give up their "morning drinking bout." They have learned that beer drinking stands in the way of their best physical development and the highest degree of athletic success. "For years sports have been in great favor. Some of these, such as contests between boatmen or between cyclists, require considerable energy and power of endurance. Evidently if alcohol increased strength these competitors would provide themselves with it and use it freely. But this is not the case. No true sportsman, either before or during the contest, touches a glass of spirits, experience having taught the harm he would thereby do to himself." (Dr. Bienfait, of Liege.)

Dr. Hewes discusses the question further in the following interesting manner:

Because these so-called hard liquors contain more alcohol than the fermented liquors, they are more harmful; but it is only a question of degree in regard to all alcoholic liquors, beer or cider, whisky or rum. The alcohol contained in any of these liquors is, when introduced into the body, capable of poisoning it. Those who have once seen men under the effect of this substance need no further evidence of its poisonous power. Its poisonous effects, however, are not confined to these cases where they are so marked as to be plain to every observer, cases where men lose their reason, their power of coordination and locomotion. A careful study of the effects of alcohol in the body reveals, as we shall see, that its action is often insidious, often for a long time giving no sign, even to the drinker himself, of the poisonous effect upon his health and strength that it is exerting.

* * * * * * *

This evidence, which tends to show that the drinking of alcohol even in moderation is injurious, is best obtained in the investigation of the effect of this drinking in moderation upon two of the vital functions of the body, that of muscular work and that of maintaining the body heat.

The end and aim of all the body processes is to work. To accomplish this end the body must keep warm. The more perfectly the body can accomplish these conditions the more able is the possessor of that body to make his way in the world. Now, alcohol, taken even in what is considered moderation, lessens the power of the body to work and to maintain its heat supply.

This conclusion is based upon experiments conducted upon large numbers of men during long periods of time. The results in regard to the effect of alcohol upon the capacity for work were obtained from investigations in the large armies of the world during active campaigns. (See p. 80.) Those in regard to the effect upon the maintenance of the body heat were obtained in part from scientific investigations carried on by physiologists in all parts of the world, in part from investigations conducted among the members of companies of arctic explorers.

In the light of our present knowledge, then, it is evident that alcohol as a beverage lessens the usefulness of the body.

A certain amount of alcohol is undoubtedly oxidized, and can be utilized for the production of energy for the body; but in the ordinary conditions of labor and exposure to which man is subjected the benefit which the body can receive from it, in cases where enough alcohol to prove a practical factor in energy production is taken, is more than offset by the deleterious effect of the alcohol. The sum total of the effect is therefore harmful.

In addition to evidence obtained by physiological investigations, we have the evidence of statistics in regard to the health and mortality of people who use alcohol and of those who do not. These have been collected in England by the life-insurance companies. They indicate that the life of the abstainer is, on the average, longer than that of the drinker.

Also, it has been found that the hospitals get their inmates to a much greater extent from the drinkers than from the abstainers. The drinker is less able to resist infection, and the physicians of these hospitals all acknowledge that, once infected with a serious disease, the chances of the alcohol drinker are much less than those of the abstainer.

In regard to sunstroke, for instance, a condition which is so common in our great cities during the summer months, Osler, in his Practice of Medicine, makes the following statement: "In the larger cities of this country the cases (of sunstroke) are almost exclusively confined to workmen who are much exposed, and at the same time have been drinking beer and whisky."

In addition to what directly harmful effects alcohol may have upon the health through its action upon the tissues or body functions, its use has another possible effect, which has to be taken into account in any consideration of this use from a hygienic point of view. This effect is the formation of what is known as the alcohol habit. A description of this deplorable condition is given in the sections on alcohol and the alcohol habit in Chapter XI. It is sufficient merely to mention it here as one of the dangers attending the use of alcohol

The indulgence in any practice involving risk from the point of view of health or welfare is justifiable only in cases where the benefit to be derived from the practice is proportionate to the risk involved, and where the same benefit can not be obtained in some manner involving less or no risk. The danger of the use of alcoholic drinks and the harm which may follow this use are, in a general average, out of all proportion to the possible benefit which is or can be derived from it. This use is therefore unjustifiable, and should be condemned in all manuals of hygiene.

J. Sims Woodhead, M. D., professor of pathology in the University of Cambridge, England, writes as follows:

The sirdar, Sir Herbert Kitchener, and General Gatacre, in their advances up the Nile, have strictly forbidden the supply of alcoholic liquors to any of the troops under their command. We learn that they took this step on two grounds: First, on the ground that from long experience they were convinced that the physical condition of the troops would under these conditions be enormously improved, and the men would have much greater staying powers, while their dash, determination, and steadiness would also be increased. The second ground appears to have been that the mental and moral stamina of the troops would be preserved in a far greater degree than could possibly be the case if alcohol were served out. The result has been that the health, spirits, and conduct of the troops have been the admiration of all those who have had any dealings with them, and this experiment on a large scale has been an unqualified success.

Prof. William B. Carpenter, M. D., LL. D., F. R. S., author of Principles of Human Physiology, and other scientific works, calls attention to this subject in a very interesting way. Dr. Carpenter is an authority the world over, and he has discussed these questions with great lucidity and ability. In speaking of the different armies, and especially of different regiments in the British army, as to their ability to withstand forced marches and the hardships which necessarily come to soldiers, he says:

On the other hand, my late friend, Dr. Edmund Parkes—a man held in the highest esteem among us for the services he rendered to the hygiene of our army—informed me that having served in early life as assistant surgeon in India in an European regiment, of which about one-half were total abstainers and the other half very temperate men, this regiment enjoyed a remarkable immunity from cholera and fever when marching through a very pestilential country—

And, Mr. President, I will say parenthetically that it is a fact, established by the highest scientific authorities and never disputed, that in all epidemics of cholera and other diseases of that nature it is not the total abstainers or even the moderate drinkers who suffer to any considerable extent, but the men who habitually use alcoholic drinks. Dr. Carpenter continues—whilst the regiment they were on their way to replace, while marching through the same country in the opposite direction, had a large number of men struck down. I was so impressed with this fact that I traced out the medical reports of Dr. Parkes's regiment for several consecutive years and found that its average of sickness and mortality was only about half of that of the other regiments in the Madras command, which was at that time the lowest of the three presidencies.

The London Lancet, the foremost medical journal in the world, says in its issue of April 1, 1899:

Any increased consumption of beer—

And I desire that the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will listen to this authority. It has had some influence on my mind, and I trust it may have upon his—

Any increased consumption of beer, however good for the brewers and the national exchequer, will not conduce to sobriety or to a diminution of the disease and misery produced by alcoholism.

A recent issue of the Scientific American has the following:

Beer not only creates an appetite for something stronger, but its immediate influence and effect upon crime are more dangerous in the community than the stronger liquors, in this way: The excessive use of the stronger drinks is liable to make men drunk and helpless, unable to do much harm, while beer excites men to acts of violence, desperation, and crime.

The use of beer has been found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organs. In appearance the beer drinker may be the picture of health, but in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease.

Let me introduce a little more testimony on this point; testimony which goes to show conclusivaly that liquor drinking is not conducive to health or strength, but that it inevitably does harm to the individual, and equally so to great armies.

Dr. G. von Bunge, professor of physiological chemistry in the University of Basle, says:

In connection with the sanitation of armies, thousands of experiments upon large bodies of men have been made, and have led to the result that in peace and war, in every climate, in heat, cold, and rain, soldiers are better able to endure the fatigues of the most exhausting marches when they are not allowed any alcohol.

Dr. Adolf Fick, professor of physiology in the University of Würzburg, says:

It is quite beyond doubt that every dose of alcohol, even the most moderate, diminishes the strength.

In perfect harmony with the foregoing is the testimony of William B. Rochester, brigadier-general, United States Army (retired):

It has been shown over and over that those who endure the greatest fatigue and exposure are the men who do not drink.

The Journal of Inebriety, October, 1899, discusses the subject as follows:

By order of Field-Marshal Lord Wolseley, British commander in chief, careful and exhaustive experiments were made with a view to ascertaining the relative effects of alcohol and of total abstinence upon the physical endurance and staying qualities of the troops. One regiment was deprived of every form of alcoholic drink, while another belonging to the same brigade was allowed to purchase, as usual, malt liquor at the canteen, and another would receive a daily ration of whisky.

In each instance the experiment showed that, whereas at the first the regiment which had received an allowance of grog surpassed the other in dash and impetuosity of attack, yet, after the third or fourth day its members began to show notable signs of lassitude and lack of spirit and endurance. The same manifestations, though in a minor and slower degree, were apparent in the regiment restricted to malt liquors, whereas the men who had been kept from every form of alcoholic drink increased in staying power, alertness, and vigor every day.

The results of these experiments led the British war department to decide, not on the ground of principle, but solely for the sake of maintaining the power of endurance of the troops now engaged in the Soudan campaign, not to permit a single drop of alcohol in camp save for hospital use.

Dr. Edward L. Fox, president of the British Medical Association, in his annual address before the sixty-second annual meeting of that association, remarked:

How important it is for a nation to know that any excess in muscular work, as in the forced marches of an army, is rendered far more difficult by the use of alcohol; that it not only fails in giving power in the work of the muscles of the heart, but acts distinctly as a depressant; that it never enhances the temperature of the body, and that in its pure state it is in no sense a food. All this knowledge has been gained by the observation of medical men.

Mr. President, well does Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, the devoted superintendent of the department of scientific temperance instruction of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, say:

The testimony of science shows beer to be by nature a dangerous drink; that intoxication from beer is even more demoralizing than from stronger liquors; that because of its inherent characteristics its use can be counted on to lower the moral, mental, and physical force of the users.

The disgraceful results of its use in our new possessions, which have made every true American blush for his nation's honor, have been just such as inevitably follow the drinking of a beverage whose inherent characteristics are those of beer, and show the weakness of the claim often advanced that the sale of beer in the army canteen will keep the soldier from the saloon.

The nature of beer is not at all changed by selling it in the canteen instead of in the saloon. The argument is most specious that it would be less temptation to the soldier if he were not obliged to go to the saloon outside, but could get beer within the camp, where it would be an ever-present invitation to the thirst induced by the tropical heat. The philosophy of the petition, "Lead us not into temptation," is thrown into contempt by this reasoning, and the United States is asked to provide the temptation to drunkenness for the valiant men who wear its uniform, and stand ready to defend its flag, if need be, with life itself.

The suggested Senate amendment assumes on the part of the people's representatives an ignorance of scientific facts about the nature of beer that are familiar to school children or else an indifference to the welfare of our Army and to our mission as the evangels of liberty to the nations of the earth. Such an amendment would misrepresent the intelligence and sincerity of purpose of the people of the United States concerning the undeveloped races which have providentially come under our care.

Mr. President, not only are we tolerating liquor selling in Army camps, but we have allowed our military officers to establish hundreds of American saloons in Manila, which is bringing wretchedness to the natives of Luzon and seriously reflecting upon the American Government.

On this question Professor Schurman, who was at the head of one of the commissions that went to the Philippine Islands, in speaking upon this subject—if he is correctly reported, and I think he is—has this to say:

I regret that the Americans allowed the saloon to get a foothold on the islands. That has hurt the Americans more than anything else, and the spectacle of Americans drunk awakens disgust in the Filipinos. We suppressed the cock fights there and permitted the taverns to flourish. One emphasized the Filipino frailty and the other the American vice. I have never seen a Filipino drunkard. The Filipinos have some excellent virtues. They are exceedingly cleanly and also exceedingly temperate.

Mr. John Foreman, who was summoned to Paris by the Peace Commission on the Philippine Islands, speaking of the Philippines, says:

Prior to the American occupation there was little beer used in the islands. Within a fortnight after the capitulation of Manila the drinking saloons had increased fourfold. According to the latest advices there are at least 20 to 1 existing in the time of the Spaniards. Drunkenness, with all its consequent evils, is rife all over the city among the new white population. The orgies of the newcomers, the incessant street brawls, the insults offered with impunity to natives of both sexes, were hardly calculated to arouse in the natives admiration for their new masters.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to argue that the preponderance of opinion among Army officers is either for or against the Army canteen. Beyond a doubt opinions are divided, and it seems that some remarkable changes of opinion have taken place. As an illustration, the Adjutant-General of the Army is now in favor of the canteen, while in 1892, when he was assistant adjutant-general, he declared against the canteen, saying that "the saloon feature should be done away with without further experiment." He substantially repeated this opinion one year ago, and is quoted as saying that "the exchange, with an open saloon, would be a first-rate thing to recommend for adoption in the army of the enemy," a sentiment in which I cordially concur.

Many of our leading officers have pronounced against the canteen—men like General Howard, General Ludlow, General Shafter, General Wheeler, General Henry, General Carlin, Surgeon-General Sternberg, and others of equal note. Surgeon-General Sternberg is on record as follows:

I do not think much of the beer canteen. The theory that the soldier needs a beer canteen to keep him from going to outside saloons for something stronger is all wrong; there is nothing in it. On the contrary, a great many young soldiers who are not accustomed to drink contract drinking habits at these canteens and are ruined. There is no need whatever for intoxicating drinks at these canteens, and it will be a good thing for the Army if they are abolished.

It is proper that I should say that Surgeon-General Sternberg is now quoted on the other side; but even if he is, the above testimony is important.

Mr. President, I will ask permission to here introduce a partial list of the officers and the names of various volunteer regiments in the late war with Spain who have given testimony against the canteen, and who prohibited it so far as their regiments were concerned.

Colonels of following regiments which had no canteens: First, Third Nebraska (Col. W. J. Bryan); First Texas; First Wisconsin; Second, Fourth, Sixth, and Eighth Ohio; Fifth, Eighth, Twelfth, and Thirteenth Pennsylvania; Second and Fifth Missouri; Twenty-fifth Kansas; One hundred and fifty-seventh, One hundred and fifty-ninth, and One hundred and sixtieth Indiana; First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Ninth Illinois; First, Second, Third, and Fourth Kentucky; District of Columbia regiment; First and Second Mississippi; First New Hampshire; Fifth and Eighth Massachusetts; First Washington; Fifteenth Minnesota; First and Second Arkansas; Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-second Iowa; First South Dakota; Second Virginia; Second South Carolina, and Second Louisiana.

To these add the following commissioned officers of lesser rank that have condemned the canteens:

Lieutenant-Colonels Trueman, North Dakota; Beck, Kansas.

Chaplains Sam Small, Third United States Engineers (no canteen); Crawford and Harbaugh, Ohio; House, Massachusetts; Hunter and Brady, Pennsylvania; White, Texas; Todd, Illinois; Phillips, Nebraska; Cook, Georgia; Stamper, Kentucky; Solomon, Missouri; Babcock, Arkansas; Kimball (regulars); Watts, Texas, and Lyman, Louisiana.

Surgeons Genella (regulars); Ward, Missouri; Penrose, Utah; Epler, Tennessee.

Adjutant Venable (United States Engineers).

Maj. Burton R. Ross, District of Columbia.

Capts. R. S. Woodson (expert on tropical diseases); Hunt, Battery D, Pennsylvania.

Lieut. A. K. Taylor (Regular Army), article in United Service Magazine.

No stronger presentation of the case has been made than by General Ludlow, who says:

It is a matter of general recognition that the use of intoxicating drinks of any kind in the Tropics conduces effectively to attack from disease. It is believed by this department that absolute prohibition is imperative. In almost every case of yellow fever developed thus far among American troops in Cuba it has been found that the patient was in the habit of drinking. It is particularly important, where a large proportion of the troops are recruits, that nothing be officially done to create in them the habit of using intoxicants. To establish canteens at the posts in the Tropics is to render the temptations of sociability and companionship practically irresistible, and the habit of drinking is readily acquired.

In alluding to General Ludlow's views, Harper's Bazaar of June 9, 1900, comments as follows:

At present 85 per cent of the United States Army is in the Tropics. Moreover, this is the keynote of the whole question, as General Ludlow puts it: "It is particularly important, where a large proportion of the troops are recruits, that nothing be officially done to create in them the habit of using intoxicants." Recruits form 75 per cent of the strength of the Army. These men have left home, family, business, all minor duties, to serve their country in time of war.

Shall this country repay them by officially establishing in their midst a temptation threatening them and the loved ones to whom they will return with the horror of the vice of drinking? If, as General Corbin says, these men, in the absence of post canteens, drink native liquors in the Tropics worse in effect than the beer or light wine the canteen would furnish, it is deplorable—a hideous individual sacrifice in the cause of civilization, which the United States has undertaken in the Philippine Islands. But for such consequences of individual human frailty, amid surroundings tempting to vice, the Government is not officially responsible.

It doubtless is morally responsible so long as it sustains war in the Philippines, but the volunteer who, having served his country three years in the Tropics and come home diseased, debauched by drink, can not accuse anyone but himself if he sought his doom outside the post to which the Government assigned him. If, however, by official act the Government tempted him to drink, he shall say in bitterness of heart which is a curse upon patriotism, "I answered the call of my country at the risk of all my earthly interests, and it called me to this—dishonor, depravity."

To abolish the canteen will not regenerate the Army. But the words of General Ludlow should be the text for Congressional action: "Nothing should be done officially to create in volunteer troops the habit of using intoxicants."

Great stress has been laid here and elsewhere upon the fact that some clergymen have given testimony in favor of the continuance of the canteen, and the testimony of Archbishop Ireland has been especially dwelt upon.

It can safely be said that the clergy as a whole are opposed to the canteen, and that the bishops of the country are no exception to this rule.

A little time ago it was my privilege to conduct an inquiry in the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia on a bill which is known popularly as the anti-vivisection bill. At that meeting, unannounced, a bishop of one of the churches of the United States appeared to give testimony in favor of vivisection. Immediately it was heralded to the country and the world that that great man—for he is a great man—had lent the authority of his name to the practice of unrestricted vivisection; but no one took the trouble to inquire how many bishops in this country had protested against the practice and had written me personally that they were in favor of the bill that was under consideration. At that very moment I had in my committee room more than twenty letters from distinguished bishops of the various religious denominations in the United States, and hundreds of letters from distinguished clergymen, pleading for the passage of the bill which a single bishop had appeared to oppose.

One or two clergymen have appeared, possibly more; one Army chaplain, possibly more, has appeared in print in favor of the continuance of the canteen; but, Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that the petitions that have been presented to this body by the hundreds and the thousands since we assembled bear the signatures of the leading clergymen of the country in opposition to the continuance of the saloon feature of our Army camps and in favor of the passage of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. A letter just received from Rev. John F. Hill, secretary of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, says that that assembly, by almost unanimous vote, urges the banishment of beer from the Army. That church numbers 1,000,000 communicants and approximately 3,000,000 adherents, and what is true of that church is equally true of every other church in the country so far as the subject under discussion is concerned.

On this point I beg to say that I have in my hand an article recently written by a post chaplain to the editor of the Atlanta Journal, and, as it is of the greatest possible interest to every person who is interested in this question on one side or the other, as it states the proposition with great clearness and strength, and seems to clear away some of the cobwebs that have been thrust into this discussion by the friends of the Army canteen, I will ask permission, without reading it, to insert it as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

Editor of the Atlanta Journal:

Your editorial last Friday concerning the Army canteen indicates the confusion of mind obtaining generally as to what are the merits and demerits of that institution. As a chaplain in the Army I have my views and convictions, which I have formed after many years of observation, under favorable conditions, to satisfy myself as to its influence for good or evil. I take it that the public is entitled to a statement of these conclusions.

During the last thirteen years I have served at posts where canteens were in operation. Thirteen years ago they were experimental, most posts having post-traders' stores, which furnished beer to officers and men. When it was proposed to substitute cooperative canteens for traders' stores I lent my influence for the change, as it was argued that officers could control canteens more successfully than they could the stores. I hoped that a saloon could be controlled in the interests of a temperate use of intoxicating liquors. But after thirteen years of close observation, I have been forced to abandon all hope of regulation, and to become as much opposed to the canteen as I was then opposed to the traders.

The fact is, I have never seen the canteen regulated but once, and then for only a few weeks by one post commander in all this time. I have often heard of such canteens, but they were far away from where I served. One I have heard of was in New Mexico many years ago, where there seems to have been an ideal sergeant, who run an ideal canteen, and it has been the most pointed-out canteen in the history of the Army. What a close observation at the time might have revealed I do not know, but I have been forced to believe that it existed as an Army myth more than a reality.

My first experience with a canteen was at Fort Omaha. It was a pet institution of the post commander, and did more to set the gait for the Army than any other except, perhaps, one at Vancouver barracks, where the experiment was first tried. It paid dividends at the rate of from $7,000 to possibly $10,000 a year, if my memory serves me correctly. This was in a command of 400 men. I have frequently gone into it when the noise of the boisterous, drunken mob that filled it to overflowing was so great that no ordinary conversation could be carried on in it. Sitting around tables were maudlin, cursing soldiers, while others were filling the air with curses as they surged around in the crowd. Such a saloon could not exist in Atlanta an hour. But this was a regulated canteen, according to the views of the post commander, whose reports were quoted in Congress in those days.

The officer in charge was drunk almost daily, until his wife went to the regimental commander over and over again, pleading to have him relieved, and finally came to me almost distracted, and urged me to go to the commanding officer to recommend that he be relieved, which I could not do, as no suggestion from me concerning that caldron would be tolerated. Her only satisfaction was the assurance that the captain could manage the canteen more successfully than any other officer in the regiment. At one time I attempted to bring the attention of the War Department to the condition of matters in my monthly report, but my report was returned to me with peremptory orders to make my report without referring to anything relating to post administration.

My second experience was at Fort Niobrara, Nebr., where I served seven years with four different regiments, comprising infantry and cavalry, which gave me opportunity to observe the administration of the canteen under different managements. The chapel and post schools were within 100 feet of the canteen, and as chaplain I had charge of both schools and chapel services, the latter usually two and often more than two evenings in the week besides Sundays. I therefore had excellent opportunities to observe the kind of regulation it had. I regret to say that the saloon was run wide open and for all the money there was in it. The command usually consisted of about 450 to 500 men. The usual consumption of beer per month was three carloads, but I have known it to reach four carloads. The noise of this saloon could be heard to the remotest parts of the garrison.

The religious services have been so disturbed at times as to make it exceedingly embarrassing, the howling crowd taking up our religious songs and repeating them in the saloon along with their blasphemous curses. In conversation with one officer who had charge of the canteen he said to me: "I keep just as far from the thing as I can." Under one officer the peculations by the civilians who conducted the sales consumed all the profits. The officer could not reconcile himself to go there and manage the miserable business, and it simply run itself.

On one occasion a soldier drank heavily at the canteen and killed a comrade, for which he was hung. While conducting the funeral services of the murdered man, I dwelt on the two forces operating in every community for good and evil; that the forces for righteousness are represented by the churches, and the forces for ruin are represented by the saloon; that at this post the chapel stands for instruction in righteousness, and the canteen for the destruction of men, and each soldier must choose with which to keep company.

Just at that juncture the officer who had charge of the funeral, of whose company both the murderer and murdered man were members, stepped up to the platform and said, "It is time to close these services," though I had not been speaking more than ten minutes when he did so. I replied that I had charge of this part of the ceremony, and proceeded with my address. At the close of the service I asked him what he meant, and he replied that when a chaplain inveighs against the canteen as I was doing, and especially in the presence of the commanding officer, it was time some one should call him down.

At another time a soldier was on an extended spree, drinking at the canteen, and becoming crazed with drink seized his rifle and shot down one soldier, killing him instantly, and then began shooting at everyone he saw, and in turn was shot down and mortally wounded by command of an officer who happened near at hand and who was in imminent danger himself.

On another occasion I heard the tumult at the canteen, being at my own quarters, a quarter of a mile distant, and knew that trouble was brewing. I hurried to the officer in charge, who went with me as fast as we could go, and arrived just as the quarrels culminated in a general fight and the throwing of beer mugs, in which one soldier was almost fatally cut in the head and neck, from which he bled most profusely, and was carried to the hospital.

At my present post I have had little occasion to observe the canteen. It is situated quite apart from where my duties lead me, and I can give little information concerning it. It is commonly known that under the administration of one officer in its charge a large sum, amounting to $2,000 or more, was squandered or embezzled or otherwise gotten away with by a civilian steward, to whom the management was committed by the officer. The noncommissioned officer now in charge and successor to the embezzling steward is a worthy Christian gentleman. Since he has had charge there has been only a small command and the business is insignificant.

I cite the above facts in order to expose the fiction that Army canteens are "regulated." Army officers, according to my observation, and I have served with 10 different regiments, which had canteens, will not demean themselves by remaining at canteens to regulate the conduct and the quantity of beer to be given drinking soldiers. It is below their dignity to do so, and contrary to their good sense and breeding. They are compelled, therefore, to commit this disagreeable duty to soldiers.

The soldier almost invariably selected is of the saloon keepers' class. Of course, that is so. It need hardly be stated. A man intolerant of the racket and rows of drinking men, who, with a strong hand, would restrict sales, would defeat the objects in view, namely, to make money, first and foremost, and second, to keep the men from going to cutside drinking places. My observation is that the least regulated saloons are Army canteens. There may be exceptions, but the rule is to do all the business possible and let the boys have "a good time."

Regulation is theoretical, not practical. It is the ideal canteen that is being exploited. The actual thing is altogether a different thing. We hear among the friends of the canteen much about "young men's club," but it is a young men's club run so as to satisfy the young men, not what every father and mother would create for their sons. It is the debauching, ruining menace to every young man who enters the Army. It is a cooperative saloon, created by the Government, fostered by it, and commended to the young man just from the restraining influences of home, at the weakest period in his life, as his club. Here are the games, the amusements, all attractions, including reading room and library, to draw him to it and place him under its influence.

Where is such an institution to be found in civil life? To propose such a scheme for young men in the communities from which recruits are drawn would call out the universal protest of all good people; but that is what is created by the Government at all Army posts. It is based, too, upon the doctrine that the temperance homes of the country, from which the Government prefers to draw its recruits, the churches, the young people's societies, such as the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and other temperance societies to which the country owes so much for existing temperance sentiment, and the public schools which inculcate the doctrines of total abstinence on grounds of health, upon the doctrine, I say, that all these instrumentalities, working together for total abstinence, have been in error, and that the right way to treat the subject of temperance with young men is to establish young men's clubs to be run so as to keep the young men in their own saloons rather than take the risk of their going to ruin in some other saloon. What community would consider such a proposition for a moment? The dread of city parents is the young men's clubs.

The Government canteen idea lowers the conscience standard of both officers and men. It inculcates the idea of tolerance of the vice of drinking. It holds up the idea of a temperate use of drink as against the idea of total abstinence. The ideals are utterly opposed to the ideals of the best moral forces of society. I cite another circumstance in proof. At Fort Niobrara I was holding my usual temperance meeting one evening (I hold a total abstinence meeting every Tuesday night when the command is large enough to enable me to do so and other conditions permit, and at these meetings I have taken somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 total-abstinence pledges within the last five years).

In my address I stated what I believed to be true—that every officer of the command would rejoice to have every man in the command take a total abstinence pledge and keep it. I stated this as an argument to persuade the men to take pledges, that in doing so they would please their company commanders. The next morning an orderly came to my quarters with the compliments of the commanding officer, the colonel of a regiment, stating that he desired to see me at headquarters. I went at once, when the question was asked whether I was correctly reported as saying that the officers of the regiment would be glad if all the men would take total abstinence pledges and keep them.

I stated that I had been correctly reported. The officer asked on whose authority I had made this statement. I stated that it was on no one's authority, but that I believed it to be so from my general knowledge of the officers. He replied that it was not the wish of the officers of his regiment that the men should take total abstinence pledges, and that he desired me not to so represent them; that they preferred them to be taught the temperate use of beer.

At first many officers were opposed to the cooperative saloon; but the War Department forced it upon such officers, even going so far as to send officers to posts to organize canteens where officers did not organize them. Many officers refused to have charge of saloons, it being a violation of their scruples, and some barely escaped court-martial for disobedience of orders; but the canteen finally won. The effect of this policy has been to constrain officers to accept the institution. I know that many officers abhor the saloon, but it is the solution that seems to be accepted; as they see no better way to solve this serious and difficult question, they almost unanimously recommend it.

The only way I can account for the interruption at the funeral, and my being corrected as to the wishes of the officers concerning the men taking total abstinence pledges, and the late recommendations of officers in favor of the canteens, is that this canteen theory of existing legislation modifies the views of officers, as well as men, and produces a toleration of, rather than a repugnance for, the wicked business. In my opinion this Government canteen doctrine is a dangerous one to inculcate in the minds of hundreds of thousands of young men of this country who are destined to military service to be returned to citizenship, and to be fathers of children of the future Republic and the heads of households and pillars of churches. It will result in an undoing of the best work of these days.

It is true, as you state, that officers of the Army almost unanimously recommend the canteen, but it should be remembered that these officers have been in a Government process of training for the last thirteen years, preparing them to hold this opinion, and that it was foreknown what views were held, where the policy of the Army is shaped, as to what is regarded as the best solution of the problem, and I ask what answer might be reasonably expected under such circumstances. Furthermore the business success of the canteens gains adherence of many who do not consider so seriously as many of us do the moral influences radiating from the saloon.

The sound policy for the Government on this moral question, in my opinion, is not to put itself athwart the doctrines of the churches and the homes, and undo the cherished work of parents and Christian workers, but to buttress in every way possible the teachings of these best citizens and institutions of the Republic, and endeavor to return their sons to society as solidly temperate as when they enlisted.

This is possible. If all drink were outlawed to soldiers, and if recruiting officers were instructed to explain this fully to recruits; if then company commanders, commanders, and noncommissioned officers in charge of squads were charged to restrain the men, as far as possible, from going to drinking places and using intoxicating liquors; and if penalties, such as discharge in distant colonies without honor and with forfeiture of pay and return passage with a few months at hard labor on public improvements, as the restraining motives to self-regulation, there is no reasonable doubt that the question would be settled satisfactorily to the Army and to the people. I do not think any policy will bring ideal results, but I am sure of this, that past policies have so far disappointed the American public that the time has come for a new one to have a fair trial.

I well remember when President Hayes issued his order against selling spirituous liquors to soldiers, and what a cry of impracticability went up from the Army and friends of the liquor traffic, and President Harrison abolished Sunday morning inspections and Sunday evening dress parades, how the old-timers regarded it as a kind of Sunday school affair, but it would be difficult to find an advocate of the old régime now anywhere. So it will be when the anti-canteen people at last win the day, which they are bound to do, the old régime will be looked upon as unworthy the later and better way.

ORVILLE J. NAVE,
Post Chaplain, United States Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, our army is in Cuba, in China, and in the Philippines, exposed to the dangers and diseases of a tropical climate. It is our duty to do what we can to preserve the health of our soldiers, and to that end we are in duty bound to protect them as far as possible from the evil effects of strong drink. This we surely will not do if we legalize in their midst places where intoxicants can be obtained, whether wine, whisky, rum, or beer. In this respect we ought to set a good example to the people of Cuba and the Philippines. But are we doing so? Let the following editorial from the Habana Post of July 6, 1900, headed "A disgraceful occasion," give answer:

A DISGRACEFUL OCCASION.

It was a source of genuine disappointment to the large assemblage of American citizens who gathered to witness the Vedado field sports of the soldiers belonging to the batteries stationed there that a feature not down on the programme, but made one of the most notable of the day, should have been brought prominently to their attention. The permitting of the Army canteen on the ground to the right and in front of the grand stand gave the visitors, American and Cuban, an enforced opportunity of witnessing the disgraceful spectacle of perhaps a hundred drunken soldiers, many of whom were violently disorderly, even to engaging in fist fights and general brawls in the presence and ostensibly under the supervision of the officers of the batteries.

It is doubtful if such a disgusting and disgraceful spectacle has ever before been offered the people of Cuba upon the occasion of a public celebration. Certainly not within the experience of a large proportion of the civilian visitors who went to the exercises expecting to see high-class sports, conducted in an orderly and truly American manner, has there ever been witnessed such scenes of drunkenness, disorderliness, and general confusion.

The Fourth of July was disgraced by the debauchery which prevailed, but it was even worse prostituted by officers who gave their consent to the establishing of a drinking tent in the place of public amusement, to which the public had been invited, and whose money was taken for what was supposed to be a respectably conducted exercise.

So noticeable was the debauchery for a time that some one in authority closed the place for at least two hours, giving the boys this much time in which to sober up, but it was reopened at 1 o'clock, and from that hour until the exercises were over was the rendezvous for all the Army toughs the batteries and visiting companies contained; fight after fight following as men lost their heads under the influence of liquor in the rays of a broiling tropical sun. It was a repulsive sight for the ladies, hundreds of whom were forced to view it from their grand-stand seats, and equally disgusting to the sterner sex, who love their natal day and would have been glad to have seen it observed in decency and order.

Someone is to blame for the disgrace which was brought to the United States and its flag Wednesday. How can we consistently censure ill-tempered Spaniards and Cubans from displaying it upside down when we admit to our public places of amusement disorderly conducted canteens to turn our soldiers upside down, make them lose their self-control, and indulge in rowdyism that belonged to the Bowery of other days. The canteen did not locate itself in a conspicuous part of the grounds, nor did it license itself to sell liquor to soldiers in all stages of intoxication. If it was thought necessary for the pleasure of the boys in blue that they should have their beer upon such an occasion, the canteen should have at least been put under guard and, at the worst, have been conducted decently.

Furthermore, it should have been located where visitors would not have been made to see its rowdyism and debauchery. Every self-respecting American must have felt like hiding his head in shame over the disgusting exhibition given him at the Vedado field sports on Wednesday. Small wonder it is that the Cuban ladies who were present, to whom such scenes are altogether unknown, should have shown the revulsion of feeling that many of them manifested, and small wonder is it that American ladies in the grand stand blushed with mortification at the indecencies of the day. The 4th of July was sorely disgraced in our own house.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where was that?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is published in the Habana Post of July 6, 1900.

Mr. COCKRELL. What officer was in command?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know.

Mr. President, it will not do for those who are advocating the continuance of the canteen to charge that its opponents are acting in conjunction with the saloon interests of the country, as a distinguished Army officer has asserted. Nothing is further from the truth, and it is not to the credit of any man to make that assertion.

The opponents of the canteen want to see the Army free from liquor selling, as is the Navy to-day. They conscientiously believe that harm is being wrought to our soldiers by the establishment of saloons in Army camps, and they appeal to Congress to wipe out liquor selling entirely in connection with the Army. In this contention they have my entire concurrence, and, while I am not oversanguine as to the result, I venture to express the hope that the Senate will reject the amendment proposed by the committee and let the bill stand precisely as it came from the other House.

This, in my judgment, will be a triumph for sobriety and justice, and will result in incalculable benefit to the brave men who are fighting the battles of the country amid the climatic dangers of a tropical land, where life and health can only be preserved by strict observance of physiological laws and the avoidance of artificial stimulants in all forms.

Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks a series of resolutions adopted by the American Anti-Saloon League Convention, without reading, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Resolutions of the American Anti-Saloon League Convention.

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Army which represents the power and sovereignty of the nation at home and abroad.

The soldier is not simply the hireling of the Department; he typifies the will and might of the people, and every citizen ought to be interested in his physical, mental, and moral welfare, and has the right to demand the same freedom from drinking and drunkenness in the Army that the railroad companies and many large corporations are wisely exacting of their employees, in order that the highest degree of efficiency may be attained and maintained.

We claim the scientific experiments conducted by the British army during recent years under Lord Roberts and General White in India, and the successful march in the deadly climate of the Sudan of a total-abstinence army under Lord Kitchener, abundantly disprove the statement that "soldiers must have drink."

Resolved, That we are specially opposed to that feature of the canteen system which relies upon the profits of liquor selling to improve the mess and hospital service, believing that the Government is abundantly able to and should amply provide for all the needs of the enlisted men. This feature affords a constant and menacing inducement to drink, as few men care to share regularly in the advantage of a fund they are not helping to create.

Resolved, That the two arguments for the beer canteen are unsupported by facts abundantly at hand; first, that if the lighter liquors are supplied within the canteen, men will not go outside and secure stronger drinks, and secondly, drunkenness and disorder disappear under the military supervision afforded in the canteen. The recent experience with Trooper Davis, at Fort Myer, almost within the shadow of the Capitol, the cashiering and dismissal by General Otis of four high officials in the Philippines for drunkenness and unsoldierly conduct and other similar cases either prove that the men can and do get drunk on liquors sold in the canteen or else do go outside and get stronger liquors notwithstanding the canteen, or both, either fact of which destroys the validity of the argument for the present system. Further, the present law, approved March 2, 1899, even as liberally construed by the Attorney-General, forbids the assignment or detail of any officer or private soldier to participate in the sale of liquor in the canteen as bartender or otherwise, and if this law is respected and obeyed by the War Department, the military supervision of liquor selling in the canteen is an impossibility, and unless absolutely forbidden, the Army is at the mercy of civilian bartenders, who by the misinterpretation of the law by the Attorney-General are now permitted to sell.

Resolved, That we indorse the statement in his official report in 1892 of then Assistant Adjutant-General Corbin, and which he said, February 9, 1899, still represented his views: "A cause of restlessness (in the Army) is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good, and should be done away without further experiment. The sale of beer, superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers, is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval. The men who drink spend the greater portion of their money for beer. The credit system brings them to the pay table with little or no money due. This takes all heart out of them, and makes them quite ready to ask their discharge and try some other calling," and affirm that these facts and conditions remain under the same canteen system as true to-day as in 1892.

Resolved, That after thus stating our position on the canteen we nevertheless refuse to transfer the issue to the expediency or nonexpediency of anti-canteen legislation. The people intelligently asked Congress to prohibit liquor selling in the Army, and the legislative branch responded with the Johnson-Hansbrough amendment to the act of March 2, 1899, which was held by the Judge-Advocate-General, the legal adviser of the War Department, as it was confessedly intended, to close the Army saloon.

The Attorney-General was then appealed to, and rendered an opinion foreshadowed by the then Secretary of War, Alger, which nullified the law and defeated the will of the people, against which we vehemently protest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it would have been a pleasure to me to have gone into this matter more thoroughly had I not felt that I had not the right to unnecessarily consume the time of the Senate when the Army bill is pending. I want to see the bill passed at the first possible opportunity, although I am of opinion—and in that I know that some of the most prominent Army officers in this country concur—that the bill is far from being a perfect measure, and that it contains many provisions in addition to the one that we are now considering that might profitably be amended.

It will not do for those who are contending for the continuance of beer selling in our camps to rely upon certain testimony that has been presented to the effect that desertions have decreased of late years, and that the Army canteen is largely responsible for that fact. Nobody who gives the matter any serious thought will believe that. It is well known that the quality of our soldiers has been greatly improved. That is the concurrent testimony of our military officers, and I think it can easily be shown that it is not quite so desirable a thing for a soldier to desert in the Philippines and take his chances among the savages of those islands, where most of our Army is, as it would be for him to desert in the United States.

Mr. President, I close with the suggestion that the concurrent testimony of the leaders of the medical profession the world over sustain the view I have so imperfectly stated, that great armies, as well as individuals, are better off, so far as their health and strength are concerned, when they entirely avoid intoxicating drinks, or at least when they do not use them day by day, as our soldiers will be tempted to do if the Army canteen in any form is continued in connection with our military service.

I will venture to repeat that I hope the Senate will reject the proposed amendment by the committee and will stand by the provision as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURROWS. Before the Senator sits down I should like to ask him a question. In the course of his remarks he alluded to the practice in the Navy, and said he could see no reason why the same practice should not prevail in the Army. Is the Senator so familiar with the question as to be able to state what are the law and the practice in the Navy?

Mr. GALLINGER. All I know about it is that under the administration of Secretary Long the use of spirituous drinks, including beer, has been entirely prohibited in the Navy of the United States. The Secretary issued an order to that effect, which I regret I have not at hand.

Mr. SEWELL. Let me say to the Senator that for several years the issue of liquor has been stopped. It used to be in the Navy that liquor was issued by the Government, but that has been stopped for several years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is so. That practice was abandoned in 1862, I believe. We have no saloons in connection with the navy-yards of the country. We might as properly have them in connection with navy-yards as with an Army post, but I think nobody would stand here and defend a proposition to establish saloons in connection with our navy-yards.

Mr. BURROWS. As I understand it, there is nothing in the Navy or in the navy-yards that is analogous to the canteen?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I understand it, and I am very glad indeed that it is so.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I expected to address the Senate at some length at this stage of the proceeding, but it occurs to me that perhaps I had better yield to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. He is an eminent soldier, of experience during the whole time of the war for the Union, and by reason of his membership for several years on the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Homes, of which board he is now the president, he is perhaps better qualified, certainly than any other man in the Senate, perhaps than any other man in the country, to address the Senate on this question. I give way to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit an observation?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The inquiry was made of me a little while ago as to the custom prevailing in the Navy, and I quoted Secretary Long as having announced his opposition to the use of liquor on the part of our naval heroes. It has been suggested to me that the issuance of what are called grog rations was abolished in the Navy during the civil war and it has never been restored. I think that probably is the fact.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I have been interested in this subject for a number of years. I am one of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes. I devote a great deal of my time to carrying out the wishes of Congress in that respect. Those managers are elected by Congress. It is to me one of the most honorable positions there is in this country, because I am endeavoring to conserve what I consider the best interests of the men who fought in the war, my comrades as it were, men whom I desire to help in every reasonable way. I do not mean by that that I am a pension grabber, but that it is my desire and aim to protect and conserve the interests of the old soldier of the Republic, who is unable to take care of himself, and who should be taken care of through the beneficence of the Government; and I am one of the dispensers of that beneficence.

I have studied the question of the canteen—a misnomer so far as the Government is concerned. In the Soldiers' Homes a few years ago we started an experiment, in order to keep our men within the lines of camp, of selling at one or two of the Homes beer, and nothing more. We found at the Homes where that experiment was tried that the men became satisfied. I will say a large part of the men did, because you can not satisfy all of them. A large part of the men in the Homes were willing to take their glass of beer, probably two, but under restrictions that they should not get any more, rather than to go out to the low groggeries that surround every institution of this kind in the United States. We gradually extended that.

After we found that the reports and the results at the guardhouse were favorable, after we found that the surgeon recommended it, that there were fewer men in hospital, after we found that the men themselves were contented, we extended it to all the Homes except one, I think, but practically to all the Homes in the United States. So to-day the experience of the managers of the Soldiers' Homes is to the effect that a glass or two of beer dispensed in the Homes prevents the men from going out and drinking rum and being trundled back in a wheelbarrow, with all their money gone, about pension time, and more than that, practically sometimes almost subjects for the hospital.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, to whom I shall listen with the greatest possible attention, whether he does not think there is a great difference between giving a little beer under restriction—he says not more than two glasses a day, which this proposed amendment does not accomplish so far as the soldiers are concerned—to old men who have gone through one or two wars and who are nearing the end of their pilgrimage and placing it before my boys, and the boys of other fathers in this country who leave their rural homes, enter the Army total abstinence boys, and find at the Army headquarters a place inviting them to form the habit of drinking beer, which invariably leads to the use of the stronger drinks?

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that while I shall discuss that question further on, I admit his proposition. The old soldier is a different man from the young soldier, but I became interested for the old soldier primarily. I became interested in this as a temperance measure, absolutely. I visit the Home at Hampton, Va., three or four times a year, and before the adoption of the canteen, during the time of the payment of their pensions, old soldiers were brought in drunk by the hundreds from the saloons outside. We have used every effort to stop the saloons, but they are there. The State of Virginia refuses to stop them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he thinks that Soldiers' Homes would come under the operation of this provision in case the committee amendment is voted down?

Mr. SEWELL. I want to say to the Senator that I would oppose any such extension if it were voted down. At the same time, the Soldiers' Homes of this country are supported by the Government, and it may be so construed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does he believe that a Soldiers' Home is an institution that might be termed a place used for military purposes?

Mr. SEWELL. I can not say that I do. I should use that argument in case this were extended to Soldiers' Homes. I should, as one of the managers of the Soldiers' Homes, refuse to come under this law if it were passed. At the same time, it is a Government institution. It is supported by Congress, and may be considered to be an Army post.

Mr. GALLINGER. But I think the Senator will agree that it is a fact that the sale of beer, which he says is permitted in the Soldiers' Homes, is not legalized by the Government. Is not that a fact?

Mr. SEWELL. There is no law on the subject——

Mr. GALLINGER. No law.

Mr. SEWELL. Because the Soldiers' Homes are managed by a corporation——

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. SEWELL. Which is authorized under the Government, although we are all elected by Congress as members of that corporation.

Mr. President, I wish to present some communications in relation to the matter before the Senate at the present time. The first one is from a distinguished professor of Princeton College, whose efforts in this matter prevented the Synod of New Jersey from voting against the canteen. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

34 MERCER STREET, PRINCETON, N. J.,
December 14, 1900.

DEAR SIR: You will probably not recall me, although I have been connected with Princeton for many years and am a very earnest Republican.

Permit me to refer you to my friend, the Attorney-General, for my general standing, and to my Presbyterian minister for my position in the church.

By virtue of your position on the Committee on Military Affairs, I venture to write you in reference to a very important matter in the Army bill now under consideration by your committee.

I am a pretty good temperance man, using neither beer, nor liquors, nor tobacco, and advising others to abstain; and although I am a doctor of divinity and might be supposed to have the prejudices of my class and my temperance practice, strange to say, I am earnestly in favor of retaining the canteen in the Army.

The object of this letter is to urge you to oppose the feature of the Army bill which excludes the canteen from the military posts. Strange to say, for several years I have been singularly connected with this matter, and am the one prominent minister in our church (the Presbyterian) who openly and earnestly defends the President and the Attorney-General in their course and advocates the canteen. In our Synod of New Jersey, in 1899, I took that position; also at our Presbytery. I was a commissioner to our general assembly at St. Louis last May, 1900. I again made a very earnest, if not eloquent, speech in defense of the President and the Attorney-General, and at the close that grave body broke out in very hearty applause. Much to my surprise, a dispatch in reference to the matter went all over the land on the Sunday before the Republican convention renominated that great President who is to rank with Washington and Lincoln.

These things induced me to study the canteen question thoroughly by a visit to Fort Myer and the perusal of all the testimony and replies from the commanding officers, commissioned and noncommissioned, of the whole Regular Army, save one regiment, to General Corbin. You are of course familiar with the report. I also had his excellent letter to you and data in reference to the Philippines.

Thus prepared and armed with "dynamite," I attended the meeting of the synod at Atlantic City in October. As soon as the temperance report was presented (it was of the usual character, but fortunately did not attack the President) I secured the floor, and in a speech that fairly exhausted the subject I presented the matter as earnestly, clearly, and forcibly as I could. When I had finished, and before the chairman and others had advocated the report and its resolutions, I was told "Your speech has carried the synod."

And so it was. To the astonishment of both sides the synod, by a vote of 99 to 41, recommitted the report and directed that everything in reference to the canteen and in criticism of the Government should be struck out. Now, if a grave religious body like the Presbyterian Synod of New Jersey could by a simple but earnest presentation of the facts be induced to reverse what had been its previous action, ought not the National Congress see that the retention of the canteen on its present lines (of course it is not perfect, and may be susceptible of improvement) is the best arrangement in every respect for the Army? Ninety-six per cent of the testimony was in favor of the canteen and against its abolition, and only 4 per cent was against it and in favor of its abolition. And the remarkable thing is that the strongest testimony in favor of the canteen was given by men and officers who were themselves abstainers.

This crusade against the canteen is an excellent illustration of the proverb that "extremes meet." Those who wish the canteen abolished are the extreme, but badly informed (as to this subject), advocates of temperance and the well-informed (as to their interests) saloon keepers just around the posts.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union associations and other overzealous advocates of temperance, and the keepers of the vilest saloons, are the persons who are working together to overthrow an institution which does more to promote good order, discipline, temperance, and morality in the Army than anything that could be devised. To abolish the canteen in the Army, so far from being of any benefit to the soldiers, would be an overwhelming calamity. I trust, therefore, that the Military Committee, of which you are chairman, will prevent the Senate from agreeing with the House in its action.

Pardon the personal character of certain portions of this letter. They were necessary to explain how I became interested in the question. Omitting them, if you think what I have written can in any way promote a good cause, you can use it at least as a straw in favor of what is right.

With high regard, yours, truly,

HENRY CLAY CAMERON.

Hon. WILLIAM J. SEWELL, United States Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. That letter is from a distinguished gentleman, a member of the Synod of New Jersey, a doctor of divinity. I wish to say in this connection that the word "canteen" is a misnomer. The term is "post exchange." "Canteen" comes from the English. It comes originally from the French also. It is the carrying around of liquor to the troops in action by the vivandière. It is the dispensing of liquor by the English on the march. But, as I say, it is a misnomer in our arrangement. The post exchange is instituted under the Department, and it is thus constituted. A new post is established to-day, say, with four or five companies—cavalry, artillery, infantry. There is a necessity for something outside of the Army ration. The commanding officer has the control. He need not establish a post exchange if he does not want it; but he does, as a rule. The post exchange consists of a store where you can buy anything—needles, gloves, handkerchiefs, or anything else you choose—and where the officers and their wives trade—buy things—for they can not get them at any other place.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it will not disturb the Senator, who is very courteous, I should like to make an observation. The Senator, of course, would not convey the impression that if the sale of all forms of spirituous liquors was prohibited at the so-called Army canteen or post exchange, the post exchange would not continue to accommodate the wives and daughters of the soldiers in buying their ribbons and other knicknacks.

Mr. SEWELL. I should say it would not continue.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a new construction. I have never before heard it suggested.

Mr. SEWELL. There is not sufficient profit in that portion of it to keep up the post exchange.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may be that they have to run a saloon to keep up the exchange, but I hardly think so.

Mr. SEWELL. That is my opinion, based on experience. The officer commanding appoints a junior officer as post exchange officer.

He calls the captains of the four or five troops that may be there—batteries, infantry companies—and asks them if they desire to establish a post exchange at that post. It is not an order of the Government. The Senator from New Hampshire would convey the idea that the Government is in this business. It is not.

The post exchange is established under the commander of the post, through an exchange officer appointed by him, who supervises its accounts, sees that everything goes right. He calls together the captains of the companies and asks them if they want a post exchange. They call their noncommissioned officers together, and they agree between them that a post exchange should be established, not by the Government, not by the money of the Government, not by the credit of the Government, but by the officers and men serving under the Government.

The post exchange is established. How? The members of the different companies take their post company funds and advance to the exchange officer $200 or $250 apiece. Say there are four companies. They advance a thousand dollars to buy the stock. The noncommissioned officers are called together. They say what they want sold in the exchange, all the little details, and everything that the men want. The officer who has charge appoints a civilian steward, any civilian employee that is necessary for the store and for what may be termed the canteen, which may be in a separate building or in a separate room. But he makes the appointment.

At the end of every month the accounts are cast up and a declaration of a dividend is made to each company. Usually in a four-company post it is a hundred dollars a month for each company, or a hundred and twenty-five dollars, and that goes to the captain of the company to purchase necessary articles for the enjoyment of his men—eggs, butter, poultry, which are not served in the Army rations. The money is used in that way.

Now, the ordinary idea is that the Government is in the rum business. A great many good people write to me every day—people whom I appreciate fully; people for whom I have great respect and admiration, men and women—"Are you going to aid the Government in this business? Are you going to sell rum and ruin all our boys?" That is all they know about it. They do not know that a man like me acts from a temperance standpoint. I have visited posts of the Army. My experience has been varied for a number of years. I know that young men will have stimulants, and there are very few exceptions to the rule. The best thing to do is to give them a gentle, mild stimulant, and keep them within the Army post. There is not a post of the Army that has not a cordon of saloons in its near vicinity, and the Government seems to be unable to stop it. My experience has been that if you will give these young men, if they want it, a drink of beer, it will satisfy them, and it does not lead to anything else, either. But if you do not do it, they will go out and get the vilest stuff in the world, and more than that, they will be allured to still worse things outside of the Army post.

I wish to say a word in response to the Senator who has just spoken in reference to his idea that strong drink will be issued in case beer is allowed. I want to go back to the period of the post trader, the sutler in the Army, when everything was allowed, practically. But ever since the restriction to beer and light wines has been made under the order of the Secretary of War there has been no such thing as strong drinking within the limits of Army posts, and why? The ordinary trader, the ordinary saloon keeper, will take the chances of violating the law, but the commissioned officer never will. His commission is at stake. His honor is at stake. The orders of his superior are such that he never will violate the law. I have said, I think, in answer to the Senator's remarks, that the Government is not engaged in the liquor traffic.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just there, if the Senator will permit me, has the Senator, or can he furnish the Senate with a copy of the order of instructions from the War Department in reference to the sale of spirituous liquors under the present law, which the Attorney-General ruled upon?

Mr. SEWELL. I can not now. It is a matter of some years ago, and I have not got it; but it is carried out to the fullest extent. I say no officer of the Army will violate an order from the War Department; his commission is at stake.

Mr. GALLINGER. In reading the testimony before the committee, if I remember correctly, and I think I do, it was stated that no soldier is under existing conditions permitted to act as a bartender; that they are outside parties always. Is the Senator quite sure——

Mr. SEWELL. Perfectly sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator quite sure——

Mr. SEWELL. Perfectly.

Mr. GALLINGER. That those outside parties will not take some chances and give the soldiers something else than beer?

Mr. SEWELL. I am very sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Human nature has changed then, Mr. President.

Mr. SEWELL. Well, it is not so.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has changed.

Mr. SEWELL. The people who dispense this beer in the Army are the employees of the post, the employees of the enlisted men, not of the Government, but they are under the supervision of an officer who will not allow anything of that kind, and his superior, the commander of the post, will not allow it. My service in the Army confirms me in the opinion that officers of the Army, as a rule, are honorable men; that they will not do what they are restricted by law from doing.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the Senator leaves that subject, will he allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire why the Senator thinks that the Government of the United States is powerless to protect the Army posts from the low dives which he says will infest them if we do not sell beer in the Army canteen.

Mr. SEWELL. Simply because they are within the limits of States that will not do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not the Government able to move the posts from those States if the States will not act?

Mr. SEWELL. We have not been able to reach that point. In the State of Virginia around the Soldiers' Home there are sixty to eighty saloons, and I have earnestly labored to endeavor to get the Virginia legislature to abolish those saloons. They will not do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, would not the Senator favor moving the posts to North Carolina——

Mr. SEWELL. I would be very glad to send them several hundred miles off, if necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. Where we have a dispensary, and where we have control of this business pretty well?

Mr. SEWELL. I should have no objection at all to their being moved.

Mr. BUTLER. When a State does not control it within its borders and the Government can not control it, it might go to a State that could. I will remark in this connection that that infection, as it is called, is growing in my State. We have quite a number of counties that have adopted that system, and if we shall get the Army posts from Virginia down to those counties they will be protected. It would be a small matter for the Government to move them from Virginia over to North Carolina into one of those counties that would protect them.

Mr. SEWELL. There might be a change of mind on the part of North Carolina after they got there.

Mr. BUTLER. We could give them a pretty good guaranty about that in certain counties.

Mr. SEWELL. Still, that is a matter which I do not desire to take up at the present time. I wish to refer to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire in relation to the scene that occurred in Cuba a short time ago—on the 4th of July—which he may attribute to the canteen. I do not know of any law or regulation which would move a canteen to a public gathering outside of the canteen building. If such was done, I should think it was very singular, and I would doubt the authority entirely. I have very grave doubts, unless the Senator believes it himself, whether I shall believe his statement. Whatever he believes I will take as granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what statement does the Senator refer to?

Mr. SEWELL. That in Habana at some meeting the canteen was moved out on the grounds.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President, that is not the statement.

Mr. SEWELL. Well?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Habana newspaper suggested that in common decency it ought to have been so moved, but it was not. It was right in the face and eyes of everybody.

Mr. SEWELL. In a city like Habana, where everybody drinks, where there is a saloon at every corner, you can not charge the canteen with getting men who are at liberty drunk. They go to places where they are under no restrictions in the world. In the canteen they are all restricted, but when they get out into a city there are no restrictions. So it is unfair to charge the canteen with anything like that.

Mr. President, I should like to present a letter of General Otis on this subject, written to a gentleman in Washington. I ask to have it read and become a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have it printed in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. SEWELL. I think I should like to have that letter read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

ROCHESTER, N. Y., October 6, 1900.

Mr. WM. EDGAR ROGERS,
Counselor at Law, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, and reply as follows:

The canteen system of the Army was introduced gradually. It made its first appearance in companies of regiments by a concert of action between company officers and men. They established a little store, stocked it with necessary articles which soldiers were obliged to obtain, and, purchasing in quantity, furnished the men with the necessary articles cheaper than they could procure them if unassisted. It finally grew into a post establishment, officers and men uniting to stock it, and it was in the nature of a department store. It was not officially recognized until the Army Regulations of 1886 were issued. It then took the place of the former trading establishment.

As a member of the board which codified those Army Regulations I opposed the canteen system, for the reason that I believed officers and soldiers should not engage in store enterprises, and advocated the retention of the trading establishment under strict measures of control. Later, after I had seen the working of the canteen system at many posts of the Army, I advocated its retention, as it was an improvement on the former trading establishment. The post canteen at large posts, when fully developed, became a sort of variety store, which kept articles for sale to officers and men and received their orders for articles which they wished to obtain. The exchange purchased them at wholesale prices and delivered them to persons ordering them at reduced rates. Hence it limited expenditures and was the means of saving the soldiers' pay. No liquors were allowed to be sold in these canteens with the exception of light wine and beer. The profits accrued mostly from the sale of beer and cigars and lunches furnished at its restaurants. These profits at the end of the month were divided among the company organizations of the post, and were expended for the soldiers' table fare. Hence all profits or surplus money obtained by the exchange went for the purchase of subsistence in company messes.

Troops sent abroad organized what might be termed a regimental exchange, which I do not think has ever been officially recognized. Regiments leaving San Francisco purchased quite heavily, and with the goods purchased set up exchange stores abroad, which soldiers patronized to purchase necessaries and as places for social gatherings. No doubt they consumed in those places large quantities of beer, but not to their detriment, however, but it is believed for their benefit, as it restrained them from the purchase of "vino" and other vile native drinks.

The exchange system is very popular with the soldier, for, as the Irishman expressed it, "You first drinks and smokes your money and then you ate it." The soldier of Saxon descent will drink intoxicating liquor the same as those of southern Europe, but, unlike those of southern Europe, they want it very strong, and the stronger the better. The tendency can not be wholly repressed, and all we can do is to labor to repress it as much as possible. The beer and light wine given to the soldiers through the exchange keep many of them from indulging in strong drink.

You say that you would like to know some facts about the "manacle" business. I know nothing of it. It is a pure invention of the newspapers of the United States. It is on a par with the charge of the newspaper man who wrote from the Philippines that my personal staff attended horse races on Sunday and that their names appeared as the patrons of a business which indulged in Sunday betting and gambling. Not one of them ever attended a horse race on Sunday. The Manila Racing Corporation, unbidden, placed their names in their printed schedule as officers, to which they never paid any attention.

Very truly, yours, E. S. OTIS.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to have read a letter from myself to the Adjutant-General of the Army, giving my views on this subject. It proceeds on the general idea that the sale of beer is an absolute temperance measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1900

GENERAL: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your reference of H. R. bill No. 8752, to prevent the selling of beer, etc., upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States.

As one of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers I have given considerable attention to the question of the sale of liquors on the grounds of the Home. We found surrounding this institution, a few years ago, a cordon of the vilest places, engaged in selling rum to the soldiers, to their physical and mental detriment, and it became absolutely necessary that something should be done to counteract it.

The sale of light beer was started in one of the Homes as an experiment, under the supervision of reliable noncommissioned officers, who were instructed to limit the amount sold to any one man. It took some time, of course, to develop what there was in this experiment, but it did develop to the satisfaction of the officers of the Home and to the Board of Managers. It was then extended to the different Homes, and the result has been even beyond our anticipation. The men, largely, are satisfied with a drink of beer, which seems to suppress their desire for a drink of whisky that they had before the sale of beer was inaugurated. The saloons referred to have, to a considerable extent, dropped off in the immediate vicinity of the Homes, the guardhouse is denuded to a great extent, and the health of the men largely improved.

Officers connected with the management of the Home who had grave doubts about the sale of beer in this way have become convinced that it is the most practical temperance measure that can be inaugurated in connection with these institutions, and would apply with equal force to all Army posts.

Personally, I am decidedly of the opinion that the abolishment of the canteen would be a great calamity, which would inevitably result in our going back to the deplorable condition of drunkenness that was so appalling. The men are happy and contented now, and the profit derived from the sale of beer is utilized in the way of comforts and luxuries that the Government does not provide, in the same manner as the canteen does for the different companies at an Army post.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

W. J. SEWELL, First Vice-President.

Brig. Gen. H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant-General U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, that conveyed my idea then from an experience of thirty years—forty, probably—and I have not changed my opinion one iota. I believe to-day that the sale of beer in Army posts, confined to beer as it will be—which it is to-day except in the case of light wines—is a temperance measure and is satisfactory to the Army, and will help the discipline and the health of every man in the service.

I find, on investigating it, that since beer has been sold under the canteen system and since there has been a restriction as to stronger liquors, the courts-martial are very much less than they were; that the desertions have gone down 40 per cent; that the inmates of hospitals are reduced 40 per cent; that the men in every way are in better condition; that the young soldier who can go to the post exchange and sit down and read the magazines, who is furnished with paper to write to his friends, his mother, and his sisters, is in very much better condition than he ever was before. When the post exchange did not exist that young man, after his military duties were over, had no place to go but his bunk or to the saloon outside. As a rule he chose the latter, and there he was not alone open to the great curse of drinking bad rum, but he was induced to do, probably, what was worse for him and his health in addition.

The canteen, as you may term it, that part of the post exchange, is entirely separate from the store. It may be in a room adjoining, it may be in the next building, but the wives of officers and men go to the store and trade freely, and buy the little items that they can not get elsewhere. They never complain of the canteen. They never complain of the fact that in the next room some man may be taking a drink of beer. But even that is disassociated from the reading room, so as not to allow any inducement to lead young men astray. They walk into the reading room and they write to their wives, their sisters, and mothers, etc., and they pick up a magazine. They are not asked to take a glass of beer, because there is no reason why they should be. They are a part of the proprietors of that as they are of the exchange. They are the owners of it. It is their institution. It is not the institution of the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States has not a dollar invested in it, but these men have.

Are you going to deprive them, under those circumstances, of the privilege of taking a glass of a mild stimulant? Are you going to drive them to the miserable saloons outside? Now, that is the alternative. If you do not give them one, they go to the other. I advocate, as a purely temperance measure, the propriety of furnishing them with the mild stimulants inside, which they are the owners of themselves, rather than to drive them to the outside.

Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate long on this subject, but I should like to have included in my remarks the letter from the Adjutant-General of August 29, 1900. I will not ask that it be read at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be printed as a part of the Senator's remarks.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 29, 1900.

DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your several inquiries concerning the post exchange or "Army canteen," I have the honor to inform you—

First. That the sale of all spirituous liquors by the canteen is and has always been absolutely prohibited.

Second. Only beer and light wines are sold to either officers or men, and these only when the commanding officer "is satisfied that giving to the troops the opportunity of obtaining such beverage within the post limits will prevent them from resorting for strong intoxicants to places without such limits, and tends to promote temperance and discipline among them."

Third. The "canteen" was established and has been maintained in the interests of temperance and betterment of discipline, with most satisfactory results. This is shown in fewer trials by courts-martial, in the decreased number of desertions, and in the improved health of the men.

Fourth. The exchange is a cooperative store where supplies are sold at cost, or as nearly so as possible, for the benefit of officers and men of the Army. The canteen is a department of the exchange constituting an enlisted men's club. Rooms in or near the soldiers' quarters are set apart for this special purpose, furnished with reading matter, billiard tables and other games, but where every form of gambling is absolutely forbidden. It is where the men write their letters home and read the newspapers and magazines. The Government has no financial interest whatever in either the exchange or canteen, the funds being supplied by the soldiers themselves. Almost every company commander has reported in favor of the exchange and canteen as an effective temperance measure. One thousand and nineteen commissioned officers have made special reports to this effect. It may be proper for me to add that in the beginning I opposed the canteen, but was brought to its support by the overwhelming evidence of its beneficent result upon the morals, health, and contentment of the service.

As set forth in the report of Assistant Surgeon Munson, United States Army, who, under instructions of the War Department, made a careful investigation into the effect of the canteen upon the health of enlisted men, the result more than met the expectations of those most interested in the promotion of temperance in the military service. He further finds that the percentage of desertion has been continually reduced since the introduction of the canteen. Prior to its introduction desertions averaged from 10 per cent to 11 per cent annually. Since its establishment these have decreased as follows: First year to 7.7, the next year to 5.7, the next to 5.7, then 6.3, the next to 3.6, then 5.3, the next to 3.4, and, finally, to 2.9. Further, the number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and offenses originating therefrom for the six years preceding the canteen was 372.5. These decreased during the following six years of its establishment to 160.6. Further, that for the seven years preceding the establishment of the canteen the average number of men who deposited their savings with the Government was 7,273. For the seven years following its introduction the average had increased to 8,382.

It has been stated in the public press that "the receipts of the exchange are nearly all for drink." To meet this statement I have to inform you that the official reports of the Department show that the receipts from sales of beer and light wines are and have been less than one-third of gross receipts—being in 1898 five-seventeenths and in 1899 six-seventeenths. Taking the amount of gross receipts on account of sale of beer and dividing it by the total number of officers and men shows that each officer and enlisted man for the year 1898 expended on account of beer only 20 cents a month—equivalent to four glasses of beer per month, or less than one glass a week apiece for each officer and man in the military service.

In 1899 the expenditure on the part of each officer and man reached an average of 58 cents per month, or but 1.9 cents a day. These facts make it clear that in comparison with all other citizens the Army of to-day is the most abstemious body in our own country. There is no community of which we have any report or knowledge that will show so small a consumption of drink per capita. This average should, in fact, appear much lower for the reason that citizen employees, of which we have taken no account, have the privilege of purchase from the canteen. The number of clerks, mechanics, and teamsters employed with an army in the field is, as you know, very large. This number, however, is not obtainable, but, you will agree, would very materially reduce the average of 20 and 58 cents a month.

If there is any further information that you desire from the records on this subject, the Department will be only too glad to furnish it. You must admit that the anxiety of temperance people outside the service about the Army is unwarranted. As compared with those existing twenty and thirty years ago—as we knew it then—or with any community at the present time anywhere in civil life, the Army is a model temperance society—a practical one; one where reasonable abstinence is the rule and where excesses are the exceptions; a society whose precepts, no less than its example, could be followed by all people in safety and sobriety.

With great respect, sincerely yours,

H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant-General, Major-General, United States Army.

Hon. WM. J. SEWELL,
Military Committee, United States Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. I will also ask to have included in my remarks a report from one of the most distinguished soldiers in the Army of the Potomac, Gen. M. R. Patrick, who became one of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes and governor of the Home at Dayton, where he had 5,000 men, and who was a great temperance man, who did not want to adopt beer selling. We finally induced him to experiment on it, and the experiment was so successful in relation to his hospital and his guardhouse that he has written a very strong report about it. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD as a part of the Senator's remarks.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[Extract from annual report of Central Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the year ending June 30, 1887.]

CENTRAL BRANCH, NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
August 1, 1887.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of this Branch for the year ending June 30, 1887:

* * * * * * *

DISCIPLINE.

Soon after the commencement of this last financal year (July 12) a beer hall was opened here in the Home for the benefit of its members.

As is well known to the Board, it was a matter that had been under discussion for years. In the Army it has been the usage to sell beer certainly for more than half a century, and for several years (I know not how many) at the other Branches of the National Home.

For some reason, I know not what, a terrible outcry was made through the press, through the mails, and by personal appeals to the governor for the redress of this outrage upon the members of the Central Branch and upon the interest of good order, good morals, and religion generally.

Possibly the fact that the governor had been known for more than fifty years as an active temperance man, both in military and civil life, may have had something to do with this onslaught upon him as a renegade. It is very true that the governor would gladly close every saloon in the land if it were in his power, but inasmuch as this central branch is hedged in on all sides by saloons, dives, and hells of the vilest character to entrap our men the moment they are outside of the gates it seemed wise to choose the less of two evils, either to furnish them with the best article of beer that can be purchased in the Home at a cheap rate, and retain our men under our own control, or suffer them to go outside, get drunk on the vilest drinks of every kind, get robbed of their money and kicked into the streets, or secreted in the infamous dives that surround us until their money is exhausted and they are turned out penniless.

The statistics and records of this Branch for the past year speak for themselves:

The official report of Hon. Ira Crawford, mayor of Dayton, gives the number of arrests of our members from July 12, 1885, to July 1, 1886, as 486, while for the same length of time, after the beer hall was opened (July 12, 1886, to July 1, 1887), as 274, a difference of 212.

The surgeon reports that the small number treated for alcoholism this year, 14, as compared with 38 in 1886 and 35 in 1885, is, without doubt, in his opinion, to be credited to the less number of members who are given to protracted debauches and bad liquor since the opening of the beer hall. Only such cases as can not with safety be treated out of hospital are brought to hospital for treatment after a spree, and those treated in camp, especially at the guardhouse, are not one-fifth as many this year as in former years.

That a large number of our men will drink to excess when they have the opportunity is true, and notwithstanding the watchfulness of our employees in the beer hall these shrewd old topers will manage to get tight; but on leaving the beer hall, if they show intoxication, they are at once sent up to the guardhouse, to remain until the next morning, without having had an opportunity to kick up a row in town, or on their way home, or along the avenues of the Home.

Still another result: The beer we furnish is of the very best, and the man who gets intoxicated on it to-day is fit to be turned out to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock, with a clear head and ready for duty, whereas a town drunk renders a man unfit for duty two, three, and four days.

Once more: The cry that less money would be sent by the pensioners and employees to their families is disposed of by the showing of treasurer's report and that of the postmaster.

The discipline and good order of the Home have never been as good as now within the last six or seven years at least, nor have the men been as contented.

I am happy to say that candid men and women of the most intense prohibition proclivities, who have been here at the Home and in Dayton making investigation fairly on the spot, have decided that under the circumstances it is best to leave the Home authorities to the exercise of their own judgment in this matter.

It is only theorists and fanatics at a distance, who know nothing of the circumstances, who keep up the cry, "Down with the beer saloon at the Soldiers' Home!" There are those who for their own purposes make statements to the effect that the men of the Home are induced to patronize the beer hall for the pecuniary benefit of somebody, presumably the Home authorities. It is true that the Home authorities and all connected with the Home are benefited by the expenditure of money in the Home instead of outside, the profits accruing from the sale of beer within the Home going to the post fund, which, as seen by the treasurer's report, has been very largely increased, thereby enabling the council of administration, of which the governor is chairman, to greatly increase the band, to afford more frequent amusements and of a higher class, to replenish library, reading room, etc., and, in general terms, to expend a large sum of money during the last year with the sole object of giving pleasure, comfort, and enjoyment to the men beyond what is provided for by Congressional appropriations.

It is not to be supposed that it is our object to make money, even for these purposes, at the expense of the health or morals of the men.

As we find it necessary we place restrictions upon hundreds of our men, some being entirely barred from the beer hall, and others being limited to one or two glasses, according to their physical, mental, or moral condition.

It is the opinion of every officer of the Home, whether prohibitionist or otherwise, that under existing circumstances the beer hall has reduced vice, crime, debauchery, sickness, and the waste of money that should go to the families of members in a very marked degree.

Very respectfully,

M. R. PATRICK, Governor.

CENTRAL BRANCH, NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
National Military Home, Ohio, May 20, 1886.

GENERAL: I have your letter of the 17th instant in relation to the beer question. To the first question, "Can it be legally done?" I answer, "It is the opinion of our best counselors that it can." I also assume that it can be done under the ninth section of our law, inasmuch as the soldiery in the service of the United States have the right to the purchase of beer on their own reservation and of the post trader, without any reference to State or local laws; and this (ninth) section gives to our men the same rights "as if they were in the Army of the United States." To the question, "Will it be for the best interests of the Home?" if I did not think it would be, I certainly would not be writing this note.

As you ask my views on this question, I will say, as a long-time company commander in garrison where strong beer or ale was on tap at the sutler's, I used my influence with my men, so far as moral suasion would go, to let it alone, because it made their brain muddy and used up their money. If they let it alone, they were less inclined to have bickerings amongst themselves, and saved money against the time of discharge. The beer of to-day is a very much lighter article—not heady, as heavy beer—and if the article is of good quality has less evil results. If I were autocrat in this part of the land, where I could control the use of intoxicants of every kind, I would banish them, but placed as we are here, our men will have beer, whisky, or something of that character, and it is utterly impossible to prevent it, every year bringing the saloons closer and closer around us, hemming us in in such wise that our men can not leave the Home without running the gantlet, and are dosed with as vile stuff as was ever brewed, to say nothing of the drugging and robbing connected with it.

I therefore accept the situation and ask myself, What is the least of the evils under the circumstances? In my own mind there is scarcely a doubt that I can so control the quality and the use of the article within the Home as to guard the men from most of the evils that grow out of their drinking habits outside. At all events, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to make the experiment, as the result can not be worse than the present usage.

So far as the moral responsibility is concerned, I am prepared to meet it. As I announced at a gathering here in the fall, and again in the winter, in a very public manner, that if the outside "saints" and "crusading ladies" could not control those hells at our gates in self-defense we should be compelled to adopt the issue of drinks ourselves, and that I should go into it this season unless some steps were taken by the outside community for our protection.

Some of the leading clergy in town hold that my point is well taken, and that from my standpoint they do not well see how I can do otherwise. I have simply said that, as is well known, I have in the past been utterly opposed to anything of the kind. I would not make the experiment now without an intimation from the president of the board and the local manager that they were in full agreement with my views. Colonel Thomas, who was as much opposed to it as myself, has within the last year and a half or two years changed ground entirely. Colonel Harris has somewhat unwillingly, as he says, come to the same conclusion. Dr. Patton, who is a very clear-headed man in all these matters, is decidedly in favor of it. In fact, the views of all the Home staff are in favor of the experiment. All I have to say is, if you say so, I will try it.

It is not thought by any of us that the substitution in any way of beer instead of coffee would be acceptable or practicable.

Very respectfully,

M. R. PATRICK, Governor.

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN,
President Board of Managers,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

MEMORANDUM.

The beer hall is the property of the United States and can not be taxed. It is entirely under the control of the council of administration of the post fund, under the laws of Congress and Articles of War, subject to the law which governs post traders and sutlers of the Army. Section 9 of the law of March 3, 1865, incorporating the Home, places all inmates under the rules and Articles of War in the same manner as if they were in the Army of the United States.

This fund is in no sense a source of profit to any individual, company, or corporation, but is used for the benefit of the men of the Home exclusively. Moreover, every man in this Home is under the supervision of the chief surgeon, and it may be regarded, and in fact really is, a great hospital, the chief surgeon deciding what men would be benefited by the use of beer and who would not be benefited, a large number of men outside the hospital, as well as in, being prohibited from entering the beer hall and others limited to a single glass or, perhaps, two. Further, it is not a source of income to the post fund from sales to citizens, men of the Home only being allowed to drink or purchase beer within these grounds. This matter has been settled in the other States—Virginia, Maine, Wisconsin, and Kansas—where beer halls have been running for years at the Branches established in these States. The status of this Home is precisely the same as that of Columbus Barracks, at Columbus, in this State.

It should also be added that it was solely as a matter of safety to the members of the Home that beer was furnished within the grounds, to prevent the horrible drunkenness, robbery, and crime committed in connection with the sale of beer and other intoxicants to the members of the Home, the governor and authorities of the Central Branch having been hostile to its introduction until compelled to open the beer hall in self-defense.

Mr. SEWELL. I have also a letter here detailing the late experience of Col. Isaac Clements, a manager of the Danville, Ill., Branch of the National Home, which I should like to have inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be inserted, without objection.

NATIONAL HOME, Danville, Ill., December 7, 1900.

GENERAL: I trust you will pardon me for writing you this letter, but I feel that my interest in good government and sobriety in the Soldiers' Home warrants me in addressing you. I see that the "anti-canteen amendment" has passed the House, and of course goes to the Senate for its action. I do not know whether it includes the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. If it does not, then I have nothing to say. If it does, then I have something to say. I came to this Home as governor strongly prejudiced against the idea of the sale of any kind of liquor on the Home grounds. My principles and my feelings were all against it, and I could scarcely discuss the matter in a dispassionate manner.

After one or two pension payments, however, the very necessities in the case forced a change in my views. At first I could not bear the idea of having the canteen operated on the Home grounds, and nothing but what seemed to me to be the most urgent necessity ever induced me to change my views. Whatever may be the facts in regard to the canteen at Army posts, there are certain facts in regard to the Soldiers' Home that should not be overlooked in Congressional legislation.

First. The members of the Soldiers' Home are advanced in years; their habits of life are formed. There are very few possibilities of any change in them. Those of them who are in the habit of drinking will continue to drink if the opportunity is offered them.

Now, right or wrong, this fact exists, and can not be ignored. As much as it may be regretted, the drink habit does exist in a portion, at least, of the members of the Home, and it will remain there while life lasts. This may be an unpleasant fact, but it is one that the administration of the Home has to deal with. These drinking men may have been the very best soldiers. In some instances the habit may have been acquired in service; in others it is used to relieve pain of rheumatic or other character. Certain it is that it exists, whatever the cause of it, and they have a right to be in the Home.

Second. Now, the various branches of the Home are located near cities of greater or less size. In those cities liquor is always to be obtained at saloons, and that, as you are aware, is frequently of the most villainous character, and those members of the Home who drink liquor will patronize them if they can not do better. Many of these dives are of such a character that men are drugged, robbed, and thrown into the streets, and the question that presents itself to the management of the Home is, "How can the evil be avoided; if not avoided, then lessened?" These facts are especially true: First, the habits of life are formed; and, second, the Homes are so situated that the opportunities can not be denied them.

Now, if by allowing them beer under proper management and control they can be kept from visiting dives and drinking the villainous stuff that they too often do drink, and from being robbed, it is certainly a wise and moral thing to do. The canteen is not the complete remedy against the evil. There are those who will patronize these dens and dives in the city in any event, but very many others who would visit them are restrained from doing so by allowing them the light drinks on the Home grounds. Again, it is two or three miles from every Home to the places in the cities where these liquors are sold. The man going into them realizes that it is not possible to get anything after leaving the saloon, and he will drink to excess, taking "just one more," which he would not do if he knew that he could get a glass of beer on returning to the Home grounds. So that the sale of beer on the Home grounds not only meets the requirements of the better class of men and prevents them from visiting the saloons in the cities, but it is some inducement to the other class not to drink to excess.

Were these Homes situated at remote points where there were no means of obtaining liquor outside, the argument might be different, but, situated as they are with all the facilities for drinking and all the inducements and temptations held out to them, wisdom most certainly dictates that some inducements be held out to them to not visit those places. I desire to state positively and unreservedly that the results of permitting the sale of beer upon the Home grounds at this Branch have been in the interests of morality and sobriety in that it has kept many of the members from visiting saloons in the town. I make no reference in this letter to the fact that the proceeds for the sale of beer goes to keep up the bands, pay for lectures, theatrical and other entertainments and amusements at the Home. I desire to place what I have to say on a higher ground, that of temperance, sobriety, and morality in the Home.

Very respectfully,

I. CLEMENTS,
Governor.

Gen. WILLIAM J. SEWELL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SEWELL. In the hearing before the Military Committee several distinguished officers delivered themselves on this subject—the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, all the heads of the departments, Colonel Guenther, United States Army, commandant United States Artillery School and colonel Fourth Artillery, Fortress Monroe, and Archbishop Ireland, who voluntarily came before the committee. I should like to have the remarks of General Breckinridge, General Guenther, and Archbishop Ireland put in the RECORD at the same time without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The matter referred to is as follows:

Brig. Gen. Joseph C. Breckinridge, Inspector-General United States Army, appeared before the committee.

Senator SEWELL. The question of the post exchange has, I presume, come under your observation a great deal. How does it strike you, as compared with the old sutlers and post traders?

General BRECKINRIDGE. Oh, it is by far the best thing we have ever had in the Army of that type.

Senator SEWELL. That is, the present condition is conducive to the good of the men?

General BRECKINRIDGE. And nothing but good that I know of. It may be occasionally there is some man injured—a man may be injured by a banana peel—but on the whole it is beneficial.

Senator SEWELL. The question is whether there is a great deal more of this drinking, and whether there are not more houses of prostitution around the camp if you abolish the canteen.

General BRECKINRIDGE. I do not think there is any doubt of that. All the tendencies of the canteen are reformatory, all beneficial. I will not say it is always reformatory, because men come to us with a fair moral character, and they go away with a fair moral character There is not a trade in the United States, I believe, that has a more sober set of men than the Army. Of course when they are separated from home influences some of them may be reckless, like other humans.

The CHAIRMAN. Like college boys.

General BRECKINRIDGE. Yes, like college boys; but the canteen is a very useful institution for their benefit. There is a little light in there that has not come to the surface that I believe, possibly, is entitled to some consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. In the canteen business?

General BRECKINRIDGE. Yes. A man who is a little hungry is more apt to be badly influenced by drink than a man who is not, and almost pari passu with the establishment of the canteen the soldier has more food, and the fact is that that is beneficial in the way of preventing them from going to excess in the way of drink. They do not care for the same amount of drink they did without the canteen, and this small amount of alcohol they get in the canteen satisfies their taste and they can not get it as easy by any means nor under such restricted influences as they get it through the canteen, because the man who sells it to them is not under any personal influence.

The CHAIRMAN. And the man who sells it to them may be restricted in selling it?

General BRECKINRIDGE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). To one glass per day to some men, or perhaps cut the allowance of some others off entirely.

General BRECKINRIDGE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And then they take that profit to purchase luxuries for the men's mess?

General BRECKINRIDGE. Yes. If there is any way of making so weak a drink endurable they are surrounded by every possible consideration. There have been very good men who have paid a great deal of attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. We are obliged to you for your suggestions and opinion and are glad to have you say a word about the canteen. I think that is the best thing in the Army in that line.

Senator BATE. Have you any suggestions to make about its influence on young men?

The CHAIRMAN. The Adjutant General wished us to hear Dr. Munson on the canteen in the Army.

Col. Francis L. Guenther, U. S. A., colonel Fourth Artillery, Fortress Monroe, appeared before the committee.

Senator SEWELL. A good deal of talk is going on now about the post exchange, and many good people of the country, especially women, are trying to abolish it. What is your impression of it, as to its effect upon the men?

Colonel GUENTHER. I have been in the Army a great many years. I entered the Army in 1854 as a cadet and have been a commissioned officer since 1859, and while I was originally opposed to the post exchange or canteen, I will say that I now think it is one of the best things that has ever been done for the enlisted men in the Army. It has increased the contentment of the men in every way, reduced drunkenness, and we have less dissatisfaction among the enlisted men. It has reduced the number of trials by court-martial and reduced the number of desertions to a great extent. I think to abolish the canteen or exchange—the exchange and the beer feature, nothing else is sold except beer—would be almost criminal.

Senator SEWELL. It is practically a temperance measure?

Colonel GUENTHER. It is practically a temperance measure.

Senator PROCTOR. In the first place, do you think it was a mistake to abolish the post traders and sutlers—that is, prevent the sale of liquor by them?

Colonel GUENTHER. I do not think they ought to be allowed to sell liquor. My experience has been with the post traders or sutlers and the men at the Western posts before the civil war, and my first impression was that the canteen would be the same thing as the old sutler's store.

Senator PROCTOR. You believe that it was right to do away with them?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes.

Senator PROCTOR. And you were afraid this would be as bad?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes.

Senator PROCTOR. But experience has changed your view?

Colonel GUENTHER. My experience over many years in different posts, in California and in the East also, has been that the canteen is very beneficial.

Senator PROCTOR. Disorder and overindulgence at the post exchange are rare, are they not?

Colonel GUENTHER. I do not think it has ever occurred at Fort Monroe. I have been there over eighteen months, and I have never known any disorder resulting from the exchange. A man can not be prevented from drinking entirely; he can be restrained, but he can not be prevented from drinking anything. If you abolish the exchanges at military posts the grog shops will flourish again in the neighborhood. Take the post at Fort Monroe. I think the saloon keepers of the little town of Phœbus, which adjoins us, and the town of Hampton, right beyond, would be glad to see the post exchange abolished. I have not any doubt but what they would contribute liberally to effect it.

Senator SEWELL. And we have a Soldiers' Home in between there with good men. I have the management of that Home, and I should feel like resigning the position if the law were abolished.

The CHAIRMAN. In naming the good things of the exchange, one officer said that the deposits of money by the men had increased under that.

Colonel GUENTHER. I think so. That is one of the results of the canteen or post exchange.

Senator WARREN. I want to ask the Colonel something we will have to consider, perhaps. This section 40 of this bill reads:

"The sale of or dealing in beer, wine, or any intoxicating liquors by any person in any post exchange or canteen or Army transport or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect."

You will notice that it says dealing in beer, wine, or any intoxicating liquors. The testimony before this committee has been that nothing but beer is sold. I want to ask whether it will endanger the usefulness of the exchange or really change existing conditions to simply take the word "beer" out and let it read: "Dealing in wine or any intoxicating liquors." There is really nothing but the sale of beer?

Colonel GUENTHER. That is correct.

Senator WARREN. I think we would do away with the opposition, or nearly all the opposition to the canteen would be done away with, if we took out the word "beer."

The CHAIRMAN. You think if you took out the word "beer" that would do away with the opposition?

Senator WARREN. Yes, sir. To people who do not understand it the idea of wine means an orgy of wickedness and drunkenness, and while it is simply imaginary, it is something very terrible to them. I have been thinking all the way through that if we could arrive at some middle ground there and really give the post all they require and yet have what we contend in the line of sobriety we would effect better legislation than this is.

The CHAIRMAN. They will say beer is intoxicating.

Senator PETTUS. A man has to work hard to get drunk on beer.

Senator WARREN. What evidence we have had has all been that nothing has been sold except beer.

The CHAIRMAN. Somebody said that they sold Rhine wines.

Senator COCKRELL. General Corbin said that was put in because there were some Germans who wanted Rhine wines, but he substantially agreed with Colonel Guenther here that nothing but beer was used, as a matter of fact. So if that language was modified so as to read, "no wines or liquors except beer," it would practically let the existing conditions of the exchange stand.

Colonel GUENTHER. I think that would be all right, so we could have beer for the men and exclude everything else.

Senator BURROWS. There is a difference, as I understand it, between what is denominated the canteen and the exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no canteen in law.

Senator BURROWS. The Secretary of War says differently, and they make a different thing of the canteen. They say, in one place, the canteen shall not be in the exchange, but shall be separated from it. How is that in your post?

Colonel GUENTHER. As I understand it, what we know as the canteen is the beer feature of the exchange.

Senator BURROWS. That is what I understand. Is this separate from the post exchange?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes; in different rooms.

Senator PROCTOR. As far as money is concerned, it is all the same; it is part of the exchange.

Senator BURROWS. That is not material, because what I want to get at is how they are kept. I want to know about the buildings themselves. You have the canteen where beer is sold separated from the exchange entirely?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes.

Senator BURROWS. You have the exchange, which is a place where the men can meet, and read and write, and have conveniences there, which is a most excellent thing?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes; they have an opportunity to write there, and it is an excellent thing.

Senator BURROWS. Where is your canteen located with reference to that?

Colonel GUENTHER. At Fort Monroe at present it is in one of the casemates adjoining the exchange, but with a separate entrance.

Senator BURROWS. Is there any communication between the two?

Colonel GUENTHER. No communication except through the front door.

Senator BURROWS. So, as a matter of fact, this talk about the temptation to drink in the post exchange is not true; the temptation is not there?

Colonel GUENTHER. No, sir.

Senator BURROWS. That has not been brought out, and I am very glad to be advised about it.

Senator PROCTOR. I think, so far as I know, in all posts that attempt is made—to keep them entirely distinct.

Senator BURROWS. That is a most excellent feature, because the exchange is superb if the selling of beer is taken away from them. The boys can go there and play a game of whist or read or write——

Senator PROCTOR. The orders in regard to that were issued years ago. I found that in reading last night. Yesterday the impression seemed to prevail that they were one and the same thing. There is no law on the subject; it is merely established by order.

Senator BURROWS. But under the orders they have done the wise thing to separate it from the exchange entirely. Now, one other thing. You were in charge of a post before the canteen was established?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes.

Senator BURROWS. Drunkenness has fallen off since the establishment of the canteen?

Colonel GUENTHER. Very greatly.

Senator BURROWS. Men satisfied their thirst for drink without going outside the post?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes.

Senator BURROWS. I want to call your attention to this: Whether from your experience, your knowledge of these matters, young men who go into the Army not addicted to the use of intoxicants are apt to acquire the habit of drink with the canteen separated from the exchange?

Colonel GUENTHER. I think the cases are very rare.

Senator BURROWS. But you think there are cases?

Colonel GUENTHER. I do not think there are any cases where the influence of the exchange is for the bad. Of course some men who join the Army acquire the habit of drinking, but they acquire that habit outside generally rather than inside the Army. I think the influence of the post is in favor of temperance.

Senator BURROWS. I think that fact, that the canteen is not in the same room, and soldiers going into the exchange to read or write or converse are not in the room where beer is sold, is an important fact.

Senator WARREN. One question along that line. Where the post is so constructed that a separate building is impossible I have noticed that it is then put in another room and usually is isolated from the balance, if possible. So it bears the same relation to the post exchange that the bar does to one of our hotels—the Arlington here or the Fifth Avenue in New York?

Colonel GUENTHER. As much separated as that; yes.

Senator WARREN. So those who seek it can, of course, find it, but the gentlemen and ladies who are patrons of the hotel never need know that there is a bar connected with it. And that is the idea, is it not, of the post exchange and canteen features?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes, sir.

Senator BURROWS. I think that is very important and that the country ought to know it—that the young man going into the Army without the habit of drink is not exposed to temptation to drink in the exchange proper.

Colonel GUENTHER. No; he is not exposed to temptation.

Senator BURROWS. Who has charge of this canteen—is it a civilian or a member of the regiment?

Colonel GUENTHER. The canteen is managed under the direction of the post commander. He appoints the post-exchange officer; he is simply a controlling influence; he makes purchases, superintends the funds, and everything of that kind, and makes the disbursements, and buys the produce, and all that.

Senator BURROWS. What I want to get at is this: The person in immediate charge of the canteen, who deals out the beer?

Colonel GUENTHER. He is a civilian. There is no man in uniform doing that at all.

Senator BURROWS. And that must be so?

Colonel GUENTHER. Yes, sir.

Senator BURROWS. You can not detail a soldier for that work?

Colonel GUENTHER. No, sir. It is only done temporarily, sometimes, when we lose our civilian and have to wait a short time to replace him; but no soldier is employed for that purpose.

Senator CARTER. This civilian is paid out of the post-exchange fund and is not charged to the Government?

Colonel GUENTHER. Exactly; out of the post-exchange fund. The Government has no pecuniary interest in the matter at all.

Senator BURROWS. This charge, so often made, that the soldiers are employed as bartenders, is not true, then?

Colonel GUENTHER. No, sir; there is no truth in that whatever.

[Colonel Guenther withdrew.]

Archbishop Ireland appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee understands that you desire to say something on the canteen question.

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to hear you.

Archbishop IRELAND. What I wish to say is based, first, on my general knowledge of the manner of treating the liquor question with any class of people, and, secondly, from what I have heard and observed regarding the working of the canteen at Fort Snelling, Minn.

So far as the general method of dealing with the liquor question is concerned, it has been my experience that it is useless to try to prohibit absolutely the use of liquor, and the world, made as it is, men having the tastes they have, if we are too severe and try to do away altogether with the use of liquor, men will find it in ways illegal and ways more harmful than they otherwise would do. And, so far as I speak of the question of the Army canteen, I have observed myself and have heard it said that the soldiers at Fort Snelling go far more seldom to St. Paul to visit saloons in St. Paul and the saloons immediately bordering on the military reservations now that the canteen is established than they did formerly when there was no canteen. They find in the camp, in the establishment, that they can have beer and wine under reasonable conditions, and they are not tempted to sneak out, as they say themselves, and get drunk.

It was well known formerly that they would go into St. Paul, and particularly so after pay day, and the result would be the following day a large number of them would turn up in the police courts. And then I know that along the military reservation it was the custom of three or four miserable saloons to establish themselves expressly and exclusively for the purpose of furnishing liquor to the soldiers—liquor of the worst kind—and not only furnishing liquor, but furnishing everything that makes for iniquity. The soldiers, when under the influence of liquor, are considered a prey for every vice and every iniquity, and much of the immorality to which some of them may be exposed comes from the use of liquor outside the forts, outside the camp grounds. Even if they were to take a little too much within the forts, they are protected against other evils—evils against which there is no protection for them when they are outside.

I know some time ago, some years ago, in the vicinity of Fort Snelling, houses of the most infamous kind were established in the name of saloons to attract the soldiers. Now there is far less chance for anything of that kind, far less chance for drunkenness, and still further less opportunity for immoralities of a more serious character. And I think for the soldiers it would be better if they were allowed a little beer. There is no use in thinking that they will become total abstainers. Very few of them will become total abstainers. What those in charge of their morals should do is to eliminate danger and reduce their drinking to moderate temperance. I say this, although all my life I have been a total abstainer, and have worked for the last thirty years in the cause of temperance, and have induced people by moral suasion in many cases to take the total abstinence pledge, and have induced thousands and thousands to do that. But when I am dealing with the people at large I am convinced that the only satisfactory and successful way is to eliminate dangers as far as possible, and to reduce the drinking to a minimum.

I have advocated high license, gentlemen, in St. Paul and Minneapolis, instead of prohibition, and I have succeeded in reducing the consumption of alcoholic liquors by that policy. I am sure the same plan would work better among the soldiers.

As to Fort Snelling, from what I have heard and observed, drunkenness has been reduced a great deal, and immorality of a worse kind has been reduced yet more, because the soldiers have been kept at home. If they get a glass of beer there, they will stay there, and if they are not able to get a glass of beer there they will sneak out, as they themselves say, and become intoxicated. I understand the canteen regulations are very good, and they can be made even more stringent in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The trouble with the soldiers has been that there has been no recreation in their camps or in the forts. After drills the soldier is tired and dull, and if he can go into the post exchange and sit down and talk and take a glass of beer right there, it is far better than to have him go out and take it in a place where there is no object in view but to rob him.

The CHAIRMAN. We had an officer here who has stated that the savings of the men since the canteen has been established have been very considerable, and that from the fund created they are enabled to give the men magazines and newspapers, and so on?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes; that is true. Bishop Goldrick, of Duluth, has always worked in the temperance cause. He is here with me to-day. He is a total abstainer himself, and I would like you to hear what he has to say on the subject of the canteen or post exchange.

Senator HARRIS. You spoke of a certain class of vile houses around the Fort Snelling Reservation.

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. Has the number of those houses been diminished since the establishment of the canteen, or otherwise?

Archbishop IRELAND. I could not answer that directly. The only answer I can give is from the men and officers, who have told me that since the establishment of the post exchange conditions are infinitely better; that the number of such houses has been diminished to a great extent. Of course, the exact number I could not myself say. Formerly I was around the fort and I knew about those things. I knew that, while they were ostensibly saloons, those houses were in reality houses of prostitution, and that the object was to get the soldiers there and get them drunk and get their money. And so I say that the canteen is far better for the soldiers and that there is far less immorality under this system.

Senator BURROWS. Just one question, if you please. Some excellent people make this objection, and I would like you to answer it: That the young man who has never been in the habit of drinking at all is tempted to drink by the canteen and led to the curse of drunkenness later on. What do you say about that?

Archbishop IRELAND. My answer is that that man in the Army is rather a rare article.

Senator BURROWS. I wanted your statement to go to the country.

Archbishop IRELAND. And, secondly, if the rare article does turn up, as it may, and he has been able to resist the temptations of the saloon in ordinary life, I think he will resist the temptations of the canteen.

Mr. SEWELL. I also should like to have the remarks of a retired officer of the Army who aided in establishing a good many of these canteens, Capt. Henry Romeyn, put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be printed without objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Capt. HENRY ROMEYN, U. S. A., retired, appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an officer of how many years' experience?

Captain ROMEYN. Thirty-five years' active service and seven years' experience with canteens at post exchanges.

Senator SEWELL. Have you had experience to any extent with the post exchange as at present conducted?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir; I have served at Fort Ringgold, Tex.; Jackson Barracks; Mount Vernon Barracks, north of Mobile, Ala., and at Fort McPherson, Ga.

Senator SEWELL. You were also in the service at the time of the old sutlers and post traders?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir; I have seen the different systems and how they work.

Senator SEWELL. What are you prepared to say as to the difference between the situation of affairs to-day and what it was originally under the post-trader and sutler system; and what effect has the post exchange had on the post and on the men?

Captain ROMEYN. I have had thirty-five years' experience in the regular and volunteer service as an officer on the active list, and in that time have seen all sorts of administration—all kinds of administration—in regard to this matter. I have seen the attempt of total prohibition in posts, and I have seen free liquor in posts. I have seen the attempt to regulate the sale of liquor—so many drinks a day and no more—and none of them conduce so well to discipline as the post exchange as at present conducted.

If I may be allowed to detail my experience, perhaps it would be as good a way as any other. I was at Fort Ringgold, Tex., on the Rio Grande River, near the little town of Riogrande City, when the canteen was established there. When the vote was taken for the establishment of the canteen I voted against it. I was not a drinking man and not in the habit of using intoxicating liquor, and I had taken my men to the Keeley cure in some cases to get them cured of the drink habit. The commanding officer, after my objection, came to me—this was after it was established—and said to me, "Will you take care of it?" I did so. In the town of Riogrande City there was almost everything that was low and vile. It was the only place the soldiers had to go for amusement outside the garrison, and it was almost universal on the part of the people in Riogrande to get the soldiers drunk. They would endeavor to get them drunk, and after the soldiers became intoxicated they would get in trouble and be robbed, and they would often wind up in the police court.

I have had my men made drunk and stripped stark naked and thrown out into the street. Two months after the canteen was established all this was stopped. The men do not drink in the post to become intoxicated, and I want to say here that I have never yet seen in all my experience a soldier who has gotten drunk in the canteen—who has gotten drunk on liquor furnished him in the canteen.

Senator WARREN. Regarding beer, is that because it is impossible to get drunk on beer or is it because the management of the so-called canteen, or exchange, does not give the men enough to get them drunk?

Captain ROMEYN. A man is not allowed to drink enough to get drunk.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that when he has had a reasonable quantity he is not allowed to purchase any more?

Captain ROMEYN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And sometimes he is not allowed to have any? If he abuses his privilege, he is not allowed to have any?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes; if a man abuses his privileges he is not allowed to have any; that is, in the posts where I have been. The soldiers save more money and the amount deposited at Fort Ringgold was nearly 300 per cent greater than before the canteen was established, showing that the men saved their money.

Senator CARTER. Will you kindly state the difficulties you encountered in connection with the attempt of prohibiting it entirely at posts?

Captain ROMEYN. The men would go outside to vile grogshops and get whisky. When they go outside it is impossible to prohibit the men from getting drunk, and the desire of the men outside who furnish the liquor to the soldiers is that they should drink as much as they will. Their object is to get their money.

Senator CARTER. You think the canteen system is better than the strict prohibition within the limits of the post?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir; because you can not enforce the prohibition system and you can enforce the canteen. In addition to the money that was deposited with the paymaster, we saved money that went to the improvement of the men's mess.

My company moved from Fort Ringgold to Mount Vernon Barracks, Ala., about eighteen months after the canteen was established, and after making one or two distributions the company took out as the company fund, as savings from the canteen, $266.

At Jackson Barracks I bought a beer table for my company, took two or three daily papers, as many magazines, and put from $60 to $75 per month on the company table, and had no drunken men. At Mount Vernon Barracks it was about the same way. There we had the Apache Indians who had been sent from Arizona, about 500 souls in all—men, women, and children. Under the law we were forbidden to sell intoxicating liquors to the Indians. I had occasion to convene a summary court-martial, and we tried 22 Indians in one day for being drunk. They got the liquor at the foot of the hill in the reservation. My recollection is I never tried more than two white men for being drunk while we were there.

At Fort McPherson there were 8 companies of the Fifth Infantry, aggregating 750 men. Fort McPherson is 4 miles from Atlanta, Ga. First we had no canteen, we had no building in which to establish it, and we were bothered with men going off the reservation and getting whisky and staying out over time or coming home drunk. The companies clubbed together and built a building at their own expense, costing about $1,600.

We stocked it with a store with such articles as men would be liable to want, and we put on a table all the illustrated weeklies, monthlies, and daily papers published in cities extending from Boston to San Francisco. We bought a baseball outfit, a basketball outfit, and an outdoor gymnasium, costing $200 to $300, and the discipline of the post was enhanced 300 per cent. With all those men in that garrison it was very unusual to have more than three or four men in the guardhouse, and I had no trouble to amount to anything while I was there with the men.

In conversation the other day my daughter said she had frequently gone over to the ice-cream saloon in the canteen, separated from the beer room by a partition, and she had never heard an unbecoming word uttered in the canteen while she was there, showing it was an orderly place. We were enabled to make an addition of from $250 to $400 a month to buy luxuries for the men's table. That furnished them butter and eggs and things that they did not get as part of their rations.

Senator BURROWS. In all your experience with this canteen you have found that the canteen is separated from what we call the exchange?

Captain ROMEYN. That is in a separate room, sir. A man can go to the reading room, as quiet as this room, and he does not have to go to the barroom to get to the reading room.

Senator BURROWS. Then a man who is not in the habit of drinking, who does not even take a glass of beer, does not have to go where the beer is dealt out?

Captain ROMEYN. No, sir.

Senator BURROWS. Do you sell from the canteen to civilians?

Captain ROMEYN. No, sir.

Senator BURROWS. Only to the soldiers?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. And the habit of treating is prohibited?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. Each man buys his own drink?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. That rule is enforced, do you think?

Captain ROMEYN. So far as I know, sir. I have not been in the barroom all the time.

Senator HARRIS. But your impression is that it is generally enforced and carried out?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is subject to supervision and inspection; somebody walks through there?

Captain ROMEYN. The officer who is in charge of the canteen is supposed to see to it.

The CHAIRMAN. And the officer of the day would naturally look around?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

Senator CARTER. What have you to say with reference to the opposition of the liquor dealers to the canteen system?

Captain ROMEYN. It takes away their profits.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are all on the so-called temperance side?

Captain ROMEYN. It is a curious fact that they and the very strong temperance people are all working for the same object—the destruction of the canteen.

Senator HARRIS. There is one additional question I would like to ask. Have you ever had any experience in total prohibition States? I believe in total prohibition States the canteen is not allowed.

Captain ROMEYN. They are not allowed to sell to people outside.

Senator WARREN. You can not control them on the reservation?

Senator PROCTOR. I do not think they are allowed to sell to anybody in prohibition States.

Captain ROMEYN. I have never had any experience of that kind. Georgia is said to be a dry State, but Georgia is not a dry State by any means.

Senator HARRIS. I want to find out how this bootlicking outside was conducted. In the report of the Secretary of War was an extract from an act of Congress approved June 30, 1890, as follows:

"No alcoholic liquors, beer, or wine shall be sold or supplied to the enlisted men in any canteen (exchange) or post-trader's store, or in any room or building at any garrison or military post in any State or Territory in which the sale of alcoholic liquors, beer, or wine is prohibited by law."

So it applies to the enlisted man; he is not allowed to have it. What I was getting at is how the men can get the liquor from the outside.

Senator PROCTOR. I was very sure that was the law in prohibition States.

Senator HARRIS. There is this grogery business surrounding military reservations.

Captain ROMEYN. I have never yet been in a place where men, if they chose, could not get whisky. I have been at a post in southern Colorado where there was no town within 30 miles, and yet the men could get whisky, and they got drunk, too. Some Mexicans would come along and take their place outside the camp, and you would see a little fire on the hill at night, and the next day some of the men would be drunk. They got the whisky out there from the Mexicans.

Senator WARREN. I want to ask one question explaining that matter as to soldiers not being allowed to solicit or treat each other. To what extent is that carried? If two soldiers come in together and order beer and one pays for it, I suppose that would be considered all right; but prohibition or the inhibition is that there shall be no teasing, no soliciting, or threatening, if you please, on the part of one soldier to get another to drink?

Captain ROMEYN. It would be difficult for an officer to answer that, because if an officer was in the room they would not urge a man.

Senator HARRIS. As I understand the regulation, it would prohibit one man paying for the two drinks. That is the regulation clear enough.

Captain ROMEYN. There is another regulation from the War Department, that a man is not allowed credit to the amount of more than one-fifth of his pay. Of course, after he has been paid the money is his own and he can do what he pleases with it; but a man can not get credit to a greater amount than one-fifth of his pay.

The CHAIRMAN. What does that amount to?

Captain ROMEYN. I used to give my men $3 a month credit. No man was ever forced to give checks.

Senator BURROWS. Is whisky ever kept on sale at the canteen?

Captain ROMEYN. No, sir.

Senator BURROWS. That law is strictly enforced?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

Senator BURROWS. And gambling is prohibited?

Captain ROMEYN. Yes, sir.

Senator BURROWS. You do not think, however, that the temperance people and saloon keepers are actuated by the same motive?

Captain ROMEYN. No, sir.

Senator SEWELL. It has the same result, though.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the attention of the Senate any longer except to impress upon its members the idea that the American soldier does not want and ought not to be condemned to a reformatory. In my opinion you can not recruit the Army of the United States if you pass this provision as it came to us, advocated as it is by a great many good men and good women. It is against our Constitution to be tied down in that way. A young American will not volunteer if he is going, as I say, to a reformatory institution.

Archbishop Ireland was asked by a distinguished member of the Senate in relation to the protection of a young man who had just left his mother and had gone into the Army, who might be induced by the canteen to get into other extravagances. He replied that the canteen is a protection to him. Every young man 20 or 25 years of age has taken a glass of beer, as a rule. Archbishop Ireland said that after he had passed the ordeal of the saloons of a large city the canteen would be a protection for him instead of alluring him to anything else.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, it is not an easy or agreeable task to argue against the very respectable ladies and men who, under the grossest of mistakes, have been making this bitter war upon the post canteen while nine-tenths of the intelligent men who are thoroughly familiar with it, officers and citizens in the vicinity, say it is a great promoter of temperance and good order and that without it the Army would return to its old days of occasional severe drinking and disorder, and all that. It appears clearly from the statistics that everything bad is diminished where the exchange is and that everything good is increased.

My eye catches one item only in a statement here. I have visited the Soldiers' Home at Dayton. I have gone over it and examined it, and under the guiding eye and the hand of Colonel Patrick, who is a stanch prohibitionist and an advocate of the canteen. He is a teetotaler and a prohibitionist. He was provost-marshal-general of the Army of the Potomac. He has been for several years the commanding officer at the Soldiers' Home at Dayton. I was told there about the condition of that Home before the post exchange was established, and I made some slight observation. I was told, by the way, that it was a common thing to find a drunken soldier in a fence corner on certain occasions more particularly.

Now, the report of Hon. Ira Crawford, mayor of Dayton, gives the number of arrests. The number, says General Patrick, from July 5, 1885, to July 1, 1886, was 484, while for the same time, after the beer hall was opened in 1886–87, the number was 274, a difference of 210, or nearly one-half.

The report upon desertions is remarkable. From 1885 to 1891, before the canteen was established, there was an average of 9.18 cases of desertion. For the six years of the canteen ending in 1897 the average of desertions was 4.53, about 4½ per cent of desertions, as against 9.18 per cent in the six years previous to the establishment of the canteen.

Here is a table showing the total number of convictions in the Army for drunkenness since the establishment of the canteen, taken from the reports of the Judge-Advocate-General:

Year.	Total number of trials and convictions in the Army.	Number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom.
1886	1,640	342
1887	1,730	289
1888	1,999	357
1889	1,752	423
1890	1,907	407
1891	2,000	417
1892	2,198	228
1893	2,189	163
1894	1,728	120
1895	1,486	142
1896	1,384	168
1897	1,245	143
Average for the 6 years 1886–1891	1,838	372.5
Average for the 6 years 1892–1897	1,605	160.6

From this it will be seen that the average for the six years from 1886 to 1891, inclusive, of convictions for drunkenness was 1,838; that the average for the six years from 1892 to 1897, inclusive, was 1,605, and the number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom ran down from 372.5, which was the average for the six years prior to the establishment of the canteen, to 160.6, which was the average for the six years from 1892 to 1897, inclusive, after the canteen system was thoroughly established.

There are some interesting statistics here concerning alcoholism.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly restate the last figures he gave?

Mr. HAWLEY. The average trials and convictions in the whole Army during the period I have named, between 1886 and 1891, was 1,838.

Mr. GALLINGER. The whole number?

Mr. HAWLEY. The number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom was 372.5 from 1886 to 1891, inclusive, six years, and 160.6 for the six years from 1892 to 1897, inclusive, a reduction of more than one-half for the six years during the existence of the canteen.

The canteen is greatly misunderstood, though I should think the public would begin to learn what it is by this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I would a great deal rather not. I am not on the witness stand for cross-examination.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator is not on the witness stand. I have no right to interrupt him without his consent, and he can use his pleasure. I merely wanted to call his attention to a matter that I thought of importance.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall be glad to hear from the Senator after I finish the remarks I have in mind. The quantity of matter is such and it is so irregularly scattered that it is vexatious to try to find it.

I have stated the fact that desertions went down from 9.18 per cent, which was the average before the canteen system was established, to 4.53 after it was established. The Adjutant-General made an elaborate report in December last giving the constitution, organization, rules, laws, and everything relating to the exchange. He says:

The post exchange was established in 1889 as a substitute for the traders' store system, which the Department had determined to abolish.

That used to be a country store, containing almost everything, rum included, and it was simply a curse, but it was legally established by the Government, and it was thought a great thing by some men to get the right to run one of those traders' stores in the vicinity of the great forts. The establishment of the post exchange made a change in all that.

Its features were: (a) A well-stocked general store, in which such goods are kept as are usually required at military posts and were formerly supplied by the trader; (b) a well-kept lunch counter, where such articles as tea, coffee, cocoa, nonalcoholic drinks, soup, fish, sandwiches, pastries, etc., are always on sale; (c) reading and recreation rooms, supplied with books, periodicals, and other reading matter, paper and envelopes, where men can write letters to their friends; billiard and pool tables, bowling alley, and facilities for other proper indoor games, as well as apparatus for outdoor sports and exercises, such as cricket, football, baseball, tennis, etc.; (d) a well-equipped gymnasium, and, incidentally, (e) a room used for no other purpose in which the sale of beer and light wines was permitted whenever the commanding officer "is satisfied that giving to the troops the opportunity of obtaining such beverage within the post limits will prevent them from resorting for strong intoxicants to places without such limits and tends to promote temperance and discipline among them."

No spirituous liquors, such as whisky, brandy, gin, and high wines, have ever been sold in the canteen, their sale being positively prohibited; the sale of beer limited to week days and must be consumed upon the premises; the practice of treating and every form of gambling absolutely forbidden. The sale of beer was authorized for two reasons. First, as above cited, to keep the men away from the drinking saloons and low dens of vice that fringe every large military post, and second, that through the profits the soldier's ration could be supplemented by such extras as milk, eggs, butter, lard, ice, and such other articles regarded as indispensable by the poorest family in civil life, but which, for obvious reasons, are not a part of the army ration. The establishment, in a few words, embodies the features of a cooperative store and an enlisted man's club.

Following the year 1889, the development of the exchange was gradual and always progressive. In the beginning a great many officers were opposed to it, but this opposition, as is shown by official records during the four or five following years, almost entirely disappeared, so that by the beginning of the year 1895 there were exchanges at every military post, and the result of the experiment was so fully demonstrated that it was recognized everywhere as a most important feature of army administration. No complaints of any consequence were made against it, and every report from commanding officers and department commanders was highly commendatory.

Some changes have been made in the system, all of them profitable in the way of laying up money for the benefit of the soldiers, diminishing drunkenness, and increasing the moneys deposited for them and their families.

They have resulted in driving away from the vicinity of the posts the saloons and dens of vice which formerly surrounded them, and by their profits they have enabled the soldier to supplement his ration with such extra articles as give him the best table fare accorded the soldiers of any nation in the world; and the abolition of the exchange, which would be the natural result from prohibiting the sale of beer, if we are to judge from the practically unanimous sentiment of the Army, would prove a most serious detriment not alone to military discipline, but to the well-being and contentment of the enlisted men.

The Secretary of War made a very careful canvass of the Army about a year ago for the purpose of informing himself on the question. He says:

Every commanding officer of regiments, battalions, troops, batteries, and companies, and the noncommissioned officers of longest service were called upon for their opinions. The opinions of general officers were not called for, for the reason that their views on the question were already of record. The views of staff officers were not required, for the reason that very few of them were serving with troops; nor of lieutenants, for the reason that the greater number of them had entered the service since the exchange system was introduced, and obviously had no knowledge of earlier conditions.

The result of this canvass, together with the information already in possession of the Department, shows that the advocates and supporters of the canteen system embraced every general officer except two, every colonel of cavalry, every colonel of artillery, every colonel of infantry but one, 504 of the 516 commanding officers of organizations, and fully 95 per cent of the noncommissioned officers of oldest service. The practical unanimity of sentiment was so apparent as to leave no room whatever for doubt. It developed the fact that 908 commanding officers and noncommissioned officers out of the 1,019, whose opinions were received, said that it has improved the discipline of the Army; 739 that it has decreased desertion; 825 that it has lessened the number of trials by court-martial for petty offenses; 909 that it has lessened drunkenness; 980 that the selling of beer at the post prevents the men from going outside to procure whisky and other strong intoxicants.

It was further developed by a careful investigation made by Assistant Surgeon Munson, United States Army—that the effect of the canteen system upon the sick rate has been so marked as to have attracted the attention of medical experts; that the percentage of cases of hospital treatment for alcoholism and its direct results, which for the ten years preceding the introduction of the canteen system averaged 64.28 per thousand, had gradually decreased during the ten years following the introduction of the canteen to 44, 46, 44, 44, 41, 37, 34, 32, 31, 30; that cases of delirium tremens had been reduced 31 per cent, and that the cases of insanity due to intoxicants had been reduced 31.7 per cent.

An eminent surgeon and physician—

In the face of this testimony of the men who are in direct contact with the system, and of expert investigation, it is safe to presume that the prohibition of the sale of beer in the post exchange means an increase of whisky drinking and drunkenness, and the consequent necessity for medical treatment, an increase of the horrors of delirium tremens and insanity, an increased number of courts-martial and punishments, and of desertions, to the scandal of the service, no less than a decrease in discipline, health, and morals, and the consequent diminution of contentment, self-esteem, and self-reliance upon the part of the enlisted men, to say nothing about its effects on the surrounding communities.

These are the results accepted by the men who are thoroughly capable of judging of the situation, and having no motive whatever for anything but a correct statement. The commanding officers, of course, take great pride in the condition of their men. Much drunkenness in the camp is a great vexation; it takes the time of the officers and destroys the time of the men.

In the face of all this testimony to the beneficent influence of the canteen as an aid to morality, health, and discipline, it may be easily understood why the Army views with a feeling of dismay any action of Congress looking to its abolition. This overwhelming majority of officers, who are responsible to the Government for the lives and well being of their men and dependable upon their good conduct, contentment, and efficiency for the correct performance of the duties enjoined upon them, reasonably feel that they are better judges of what is best for their men than outsiders, who, however praiseworthy their motives in the abstract, can have no possible knowledge of the concrete.

Here, for example, are some pages of reports from scattered posts in the Philippines. I will read two or three of them, and will state that the remainder have the same general tendency.

The commanding officer at Malolos remarks:

Although this exchange was organized less than two months ago (May 8), the good effects upon the men in added contentment and sobriety is noticeable. There has not been a case of drunkenness since its establishment, while the drinking of vino has been greatly lessened, and I believe through the sale of beer the habit of drinking it (vino) will be broken up. If no other result could be claimed for the post exchange, the continuance of that institution would be amply justified.

The commanding officer at Florida Blanca says:

Although this exchange has been in operation but two months, it has proven a satisfactory venture in every particular. The men, now that they can secure a bottle of American beer when so inclined, no longer indulge to any extent, or at all, in the poisonous native drinks which are to be had at a small sum for an unlimited quantity and which it is next to impossible to control the sale thereof.

The commanding officer at Bulacan, the commanding officer at Lubao, the commanding officer at Pampanga, the commanding officer at San Mateo, the commanding officer at San Fernando del Union, and the commanding officer at Lingayen testify to the same effect.

The commanding officer of the Third United States Cavalry at Vigan, Luzon, says:

A post exchange, when properly conducted, is a source of comfort to the soldiers, and its influence upon the welfare of a command is always salutary. It promotes discipline, temperance, and morality, and its abolition would be indeed a calamity for the Army, but a veritable godsend for the saloon keeper.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator whether there is any testimony which shows that the use of intoxicants at the post exchange is a benefit to the soldiers who use them?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not speaking of intoxicants. I leave out of consideration all the stronger liquors because it is well known that they are not sold.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is there testimony in regard to the effect of these intoxicants upon the soldiers who use them, whether it is to their advantage and for the benefit of their morals?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is not, for intoxicants are not used. So it is impossible to show what the influence would be, unless we go back to the days before the establishment of the canteen or post exchange; and then we can find plenty of statements as to the effect of the use of strong drink upon the soldiers.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is it not a fact that at the post exchange everything is now excluded but beer?

Mr. HAWLEY. Under the law as it now stands wines are admitted; that is, light wines, of course; but that is to be dropped out by the amendment proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Was there any testimony on the part of the Army officers showing why wine should be excluded?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; the opinion was that it had better be excluded because it would be rather difficult to draw the line between the light Rhenish wines and some of the stronger wines that are easily intoxicants; and so it was thought best to prohibit the sale of wine entirely.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Did any of the testimony show that wine had an injurious effect upon the soldiers?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no testimony to that effect at all, but

I gave you the reason, which is that the difference between the light wine and the strong wine is so difficult to establish that the use of wine at all is liable to lead to the drinking of the stronger kinds.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then there was no testimony to show that the effect of the wine was injurious to the soldiers?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is the opinion of General Miles and others that wine should be omitted. I think the Secretary of War favored the striking out of the word "wine."

Mr. PETTIGREW. Was any reason given for that?

Mr. HAWLEY. I decline to answer the Senator further. His questions are so inconsequential that I decline to answer another one.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course, I will not annoy the Senator, as I am well aware of his inability to answer any question.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, what does the Senator mean by that kind of a low-down insult? Has he been to a saloon outside of the post exchange?

Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, says:

I will simply state that, in the first place, I am a total abstainer; I am a thorough, absolute, and unqualified believer in the canteen as it now exists. I introduced it at the Military Academy. It reduced venereal diseases, it reduced the drunks; instead of running after lewd women and drinking whisky they stayed at home, and at the end of the first year $1,800 was turned in, which was added to the fund for mess expenses.

Among those who appeared before us was Col. Francis L. Guenther, commandant United States Artillery School and colonel Fourth Artillery at Fortress Monroe, a man who has been thirty-five years in the Army and seven years, he told us, at places where there were post exchanges. He says:

I entered the Army in 1854 as a cadet and have been a commissioned officer since 1859, and while I was originally opposed to the post exchange or canteen, I will say that I now think it is one of the best things that has ever been done for the enlisted men in the Army. It has increased the contentment of the men in every way, reduced drunkenness, and we have less dissatisfaction among the enlisted men. It has reduced the number of trials by court-martial and reduced the number of desertions to a great extent. I think to abolish the canteen or exchange would be almost criminal.

Brig. Gen. Joseph C. Breckinridge, Inspector-General United States Army, says very much the same. I quote a portion of his statement, as follows:

It is by far the best thing we have ever had in the Army of that type. All the tendencies of the canteen are reformatory, all beneficial. I will not say it is always reformatory, because men come to us with a fair moral character, and they go away with a fair moral character. There is not a trade in the United States, I believe, that has a more sober set of men than the Army. Of course, when they are separated from home influences some of them may be reckless, like other humans.

A man who is a little hungry is more apt to be badly influenced by drink than a man who is not, and almost pari passu with the establishment of the canteen the soldier has more food, and the fact is that that is beneficial in the way of preventing them from going to excess in the way of drink. They do not care for the same amount of drink they did without the canteen, and this small amount of alcohol they get in the canteen satisfies their taste, and they can not get it as easy by any means, nor under such restricted influences, as they get it through the canteen, because the man who sells it to them is not under any personal influence.

Archbishop Ireland, a very abstinent man, who lived many years in the vicinity of the post at Fort Snelling, and who has studied the workings of the canteen, says:

So far as the general method of dealing with the liquor question is concerned, it has been my experience that it is useless to try to prohibit absolutely the use of liquor, and the world, made as it is, men having the tastes they have, if we are too severe and try to do away altogether with the use of liquor, men will find it in ways illegal and ways more harmful than they otherwise would do. And, so far as I speak of the question of the Army canteen, I have observed myself and have heard it said that the soldiers at Fort Snelling go far more seldom to St. Paul to visit saloons in St. Paul and the saloons immediately bordering on the military reservations, now that the canteen is established, than they did formerly, when there was no canteen. They find in the camp, in the establishment, that they can have beer and wine under reasonable conditions, and they are not tempted to sneak out, as they say themselves, and get drunk.

It was well known formerly they would go into St. Paul, and particularly so after pay day, and the result would be the following day a large number of them would turn up in the police courts. And then I know that along the military reservation it was the custom of three or four miserable saloons to establish themselves expressly and exclusively for the purpose of furnishing liquor to the soldiers—liquor of the worst kind—and not only furnishing liquor, but furnishing everything that makes for iniquity. The soldiers, when under the influence of liquor, are considered a prey for every vice and every iniquity, and much of the immorality to which some of them may be exposed comes from the use of liquor outside the forts, outside the camp grounds. Even if they were to take a little too much within the forts, they are protected against other evils—evils against which there is no protection for them when they are outside.

I know some time ago, some years ago, in the vicinity of Fort Snelling, houses of the most infamous kind were established in the name of saloons to attract the soldiers. Now there is far less chance for anything of that kind, far less chance for drunkenness, and still further less opportunity for immoralities of a more serious character. And I think for the soldiers it would be better if they were allowed a little beer. There is no use in thinking that they will become total abstainers. Very few of them will become total abstainers. What those in charge of their morals should do is to eliminate danger and reduce their drinking to moderate temperance.

I say this, although all my life I have been a total abstainer, and have worked for the last thirty years in the cause of temperance, and have induced people by moral suasion in many cases to take the total abstinence pledge, and have induced thousands and thousands to do that. But when I am dealing with the people at large I am convinced that the only satisfactory and successful way is to eliminate dangers, as far as possible, and to reduce the drinking to a minimum.

I have advocated high license, gentlemen, in St. Paul and Minneapolis, instead of prohibition, and I have succeeded in reducing the consumption of alcoholic liquors by that policy. I am sure the same plan would work better among the soldiers.

In another place Bishop McGoldrick testifies in very much the same way.

The Secretary of War, Hon. Elihu Root, says:

May I call your attention to the collection of military testimony which is annexed to my report of last year? In that report I have set out the existing statutes and the regulations on the subject of the canteen, and I want to add one thing to this testimony. Not only is the canteen a great means of increasing the morality and health and discipline of the soldiers, but it is the one thing that makes it possible to make the camp, the military post, an agreeable place for the soldiers. We can talk about it just as much as we please—total-abstinence clubs are not successes. And the post exchange is a club, and the men get together there and they play dominoes and checkers and billiards, and they read and talk and smoke, and they drink their glass of beer, and it is an agreeable place and the men do not go away.

If you pass the provision which the House has put in, prohibiting the sale of beer and light wines in the canteen, you break that up, and the result is going to be as soon as it gets around it will stop our enlistments. That is a matter of serious practical consequence. The men are not going to enlist when they understand that they are going to be confined in the reform school.

Then he proceeds to make some comment about the vile diseases that were contracted, and the vile people who gathered around under the old system.

Rev. Oliver C. Miller, chaplain, voluntarily attached to the Fourth United States Cavalry, stated:

In conclusion, I would say that such men as Chaplains Freeland and Pierce and others who have examined conditions in the Philippines are in favor of the canteen and the present Army regulation; and just as I left, in August, the Ministerial Association of the City of Manila, which comprises the pastors of the Protestant churches there, the workers of the Young Men's Christian Association (the secretaries), and the chaplains had a meeting. At that meeting the post exchange was discussed, and the result was that after a fair discussion the ministers were unanimous, except two, that it would be a great hurt at the present time to abolish the canteen system in the Philippines, and those two clergymen were in doubt as to which way they would vote.

The Secretary of War, in his report for 1899, said:

It is recognized that alcoholism and insanity are closely related through the direct influence exerted by intoxicants in the production of mental aberration. Hence, it is not surprising to find that the average number of cases annually coming under treatment was 35.1 per cent for the seven-year period from 1885 to 1891, prior to the establishment of the canteen system, and only 24 as an annual average for the six subsequent years, 1892–1897. These figures show a reduction in insanity amounting to 31.7 per cent. As to the number of days in the service lost annually from insanity the improvement since the institution of the canteen is even more marked. Figures for the years 1885 and 1886 are not available, but for the five-year period 1887–1891 the average number of days lost was 1,563, while for the six years 1892–1897 the service annually lost to the Government from this cause amounted to only 924.5 days, a decrease of 40.9 per cent.

He said further:

During the year ending June 30, 1898, the aggregate receipts of the exchanges in operation in the Army amounted to $1,621,388.67, and there was received as money on deposit $189,258.81, making the total amount of money received $1,810,657.48. There was expended for merchandise purchased, rent, fixtures, and repairs, and expenses of operation $1,297,737.16, which, less deposit, gives a profit of $323,661.51. From this amount there was donated to the funds of the several regimental bands $9,154.51; to the maintenance of post gardens, $1,559.17; to post libraries, $640.06; to gymnasiums, $2,913.75; as prizes for the encouragement of athletic sports, $4,338.41, and after setting aside the sum of $60,877.58 as a reserve fund to meet anticipated expenses for at least one month, there was returned to the members in the form of dividends the sum of $254,890.93.

I wanted to find a statement apropos of what has been said as to the number of officers who were reported as opposing the canteen at a prior date. During the campaign the following officers were quoted as against the canteen:

Generals Miles, Shafter, Wheeler, Corbin, Sternberg (Surgeon-General), Howard, Henry, Boynton, Wilcox, Stanley, Rochester, Harries, Carr, Carlin, Graham, Bliss, Lee (Assistant Quartermaster-General). Of this number, General Shafter is the only officer on record as unalterably opposed to the canteen system. That General Miles is not opposed to the canteen system will be seen from his printed report on page 7 of House Report No. 1701, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, as also from his General Orders, No. 87, July 2, 1898, published on page 6, in which he remarks that—

"Commanding officers of all grades and officers of the medical staff will carefully note the effect of the use of such light beverages—wines and beer—as are permitted to be sold at the post and camp exchanges, and the commanders of all independent commands are enjoined to restrict, or to entirely prohibit the sale of such beverages, if the welfare of the troops or the interests of the service require such action."

This language is almost identical with that of the exchange regulations (paragraph 10). If General Wheeler is opposed to the canteen system, there is nothing of record in the War Department to show it. General Corbin and Surgeon-General Sternberg, who were originally opposed to the exchange, have both very frequently, in published statements, announced the reason for their change of opinion and their conviction that the canteen system has been most beneficial to the Army.

General Howard was originally an opponent of the canteen, but he left the service before he had had the opportunity to witness its workings. General Henry was not an opponent of the canteen: on the contrary, there are many reports on file in the War Department in which he testifies to the beneficial effects of the canteen experiment. General Boynton, as well as Assistant Quartermaster-General Lee, were witnesses of the scandalous conduct of canteens at Chickamauga Park in 1898, as conducted by volunteer organizations in violation of canteen regulations—

I suppose that has reference to the orgies to which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] alluded—and which were promptly suppressed as soon as brought to the attention of the War Department. General Wilcox left the Army before the canteen system was inaugurated. General Stanley and General Carr were both retired from active service before the canteen was fairly in operation, and if opposed to the canteen there is nothing on record in the War Department to show it. General Rochester left the service before the canteen system was inaugurated.

It is true that General Harries, while colonel of the First District of Columbia Volunteer Infantry, forbade the starting of a canteen in that regiment; but inasmuch as he has permitted a canteen to exist at the several encampments of the District of Columbia militia, of which he is the head, it is not thought that his opinion is of much weight in this connection.

General Carlin was strongly opposed to the breaking up of the post-trader system, the suppression of which resulted in the post exchange, but he left the service before the experiment was fairly under way. Neither General Graham nor General Bliss was opposed to the canteen system. Both of them are on record to the contrary. On the other hand, reference to House Report No. 1701, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, will show that the three senior general officers of the Army—Generals Miles, Merritt, and Brooke—are advocates of the canteen system.

Major-General Otis is one of the strongest advocates of the canteen, as is also General Wood, General Merriam, General MacArthur, General Chaffee, General Bates, General Wheaton, General Wilson, General Davis, General Schwan, General Hall, General Hughes, General Kobbe, Gen. J. Franklin Bell, Gen. James M. Bell, General Randall, General Hare, Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, General Funston, General Grant; in fact, of the general officers now in the service the only ones known to be opposed to the canteen system are General Shafter and General Ludlow.

To this are to be added all of the 10 colonels of cavalry, all of the 7 colonels of artillery, all of the 49 colonels of infantry except 1, and 504 of the 516 commanding officers of batteries, troops, and companies.

I will read a short note from General Sternberg:

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, October 1, 1900.

SIR: My attention has been called to a published statement, attributed to me, opposing the army canteen. I presume this statement as published is practically what I said some years since when interviewed upon the subject, although I do not at present remember to whom it was given. I did not at first look with favor upon the proposition to sell beer to soldiers at army canteens. That opinion was not based upon personal observation, as I had not been stationed at a military post since the canteen was established.

Owing to the general consensus of opinion among line officers and medical officers of the Army, who have had ample opportunity to observe the effect of the army canteen upon the habits of our soldiers, I am obliged to admit that, from a practical point of view, it seems to have accomplished very desirable results in reducing the amount of drunkenness in the Army and the disposition on the part of the soldiers to leave their stations for the purpose of obtaining spirituous liquors.

Very respectfully,
GEO. M. STERNBERG,
Surgeon-General United States Army.

THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

There is an abundance of other matter here, but I will not burden the RECORD or weary Senators.

The motive of the people who are saying so much to us is unquestionably good, but I do hope that sentiment will not be allowed to run away with what I consider the common sense of the affair. Now, here is a letter from a clergyman, which I should like to read.

I inclose an appeal that has come to me from the Woman's Temperance Union of Connecticut, and it stirs me up to write to you that the testimony from my own young men in the Army during the Spanish war—one a member of my church, another of my Sunday school—is to the effect that your substitute to section 40 of the Army bill allowing the sale of beer in the post exchange is a good thing. I hope it will pass instead of the House amendment. I presume you will be deluged with letters as a result of this appeal from the women, but are they entitled to much weight in face of the testimony of those who have been in the Army, who know how the post exchange has worked for temperance? I hope to see the Senate vote on that matter according to its judgment, and not overcome by the clamor of people who don't know what they are talking about.

Here [exhibiting] is another statement of a similar character, but it is from a prominent business man, and not from a clergyman.

No, I hope sincerely and earnestly that the Senate will not so vote as to add 20 or 30 per cent to all the crimes and misfortunes among our troops. I have the firmest belief that the return to the old-fashioned way would, in a single year, be regarded as an unspeakable calamity.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I shall vote to support the amendment of the committee, and because I shall do that I have thought it proper to give some reasons to the country, or rather to my own constituents, why I do so. I do not expect to change any votes, but I do intend to give what I consider good, sound reasons why the canteen should not be abolished.

In the first place, I will say that I can speak with great freedom upon this question, because I have never myself been addicted to the use of any kinds of spirits, either distilled, vinous, or malt. I do not chew tobacco or smoke. I have no artificial wants, and therefore have never felt the need of a drink. I will say also that I am not only a temperate man, but I have always been a temperance man.

In my State, when retail groceries had to be established by petition I never signed one. When the law was changed and localities were permitted to establish them or not, I always voted the dry ticket; and I am here speaking for the canteen amendment because it promotes temperance, because it promotes good health, because it promotes morals, because it promotes discipline, and comfort, and contentment among our soldiers. I say this upon the overwhelming testimony of the officers, from the distinguished Lieutenant-General of the Army down to the corporals who were interrogated by the circular letter asking information upon the several questions involved. I speak also upon a comparison of the record, from the Secretary of War, from the Judge-Advocate-General, from the surgeons, from the hospital reports upon this question for the six years preceding and the six years subsequent to the establishment of the canteen.

My friend the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] said that the lack of desertions could not be claimed to the credit of the canteen, because a man could not conveniently desert in Luzon or Cuba, but he neglected to note the fact that this comparison ceased in the year 1897, before there was any war in the Philippines or in Cuba. Consequently, he failed on that point.

He also made the point, which I will now notice for fear I forget it, that we forbid the use of spirits on board ship. That is very good, because a man can not step overboard into the sea and get a drink. He has to stay within the ship, and it is feasible to deny him the use of any sort of spirits or any sort of liquor. But it is not a question here whether the soldier has joined a temperance society when he joins the Army or whether by law he shall be compelled to be temperate. The question is whether he shall drink beer under certain circumstances favorable to temperance or whether he shall drink bad whisky on the outside of the compound. It is not at all a question of legislating upon the temperance of the soldier, because he can drink. If the Senator or the opposition to this measure can so arrange it that there will be no low whisky shops, with their annexes of brothels and gambling hells, right convenient to every post, then I might go with them and vote against the amendment.

The people who have been sending me petitions are all of one sort. They are against the canteen. They are church people, belonging to the most powerful and influential body of people in my State; a church that I love and respect. The petitions are from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and no man on earth can have higher deference and respect for them and their wishes than I do; but there is such a thing, and there is nothing more dangerous, than zeal without knowledge. These good people have a fervent desire in their heart to promote the cause of temperance, and I wish them godspeed and am willing to join them whenever they can show me the way. I want to promote the cause of temperance in any way, but the ways and means that appear best to them do not appear best to me, and as they have no responsibility and as I have a very great one, I am compelled to follow the record which shows that the canteen does promote temperance, morality, discipline, and comfort in the Army.

It is unnecessary to go outside of the public record. My learned friend the Senator from New Hampshire quoted the London Lancet and other authorities of the medical profession. I recollect a good many years ago (his quoting the Lancet brought it to my mind) an editorial in the Lancet that said that the workingman of Great Britain was not such a fool after all for spending part of his earnings in beer, because it is said beer built up the fiber tissue wasted by work quicker than any other form of food. I do not know whether or not that is true, but that is what the Lancet said at that time. But at any rate we have here the Lieutenant-General of the Army, the Adjutant-General of the Army, commanders of every grade before the committee testifying all one way, so far as I am informed.

Do these good people who want temperance—these good people who petition their Senators (and I want to say a great many of the Senators are more likely to vote their opinion about it than their judgment; I find no fault with them, but I think it is the fact) know what a canteen or a post exchange is? Here is what the Army Regulations say it is:

The post exchange will combine the features of reading and recreation rooms, a cooperative store, and a restaurant. Its primary purpose is to supply the troops at reasonable prices with the articles of ordinary use, wear, and consumption not supplied by the Government, and to afford the means of rational recreation and amusement.

Its secondary purpose is through exchange profits to provide the means for improving the messes.

* * * * * * *

An exchange doing its full work should embrace the following sections: (a) A well-stocked general store, in which such goods are kept as are usually required at military posts, and as extensive in number and variety as conditions will justify; (b) a well-kept lunch counter, supplied with as great a variety of viands as circumstances permit, such as tea, coffee, cocoa, nonalcoholic drinks, soup, fish, cooked and canned meats, sandwiches, pastries, etc.; (c) a canteen, at which, under the conditions hereinafter set forth, beer and light wines by the drink, and tobaccos, may be sold; (d) reading and recreation rooms, supplied with books, periodicals, and other reading matter, billiard and pool tables, bowling alley, and facilities for other proper indoor games, as well as apparatus for outdoor sports and exercises, such as cricket, football, baseball, tennis, etc.; a well-equipped gymnasium, possessing also the requisite paraphernalia for outdoor athletics.

At small posts it may be impracticable to maintain all of these sections, but at every exchange there should be no less than two departments—the refreshment, embracing store, lunch counter, and canteen, and the recreation, which includes all the other branches.

10. Sale of liquors prohibited.—The sale or use of ardent spirits in any branch of the exchange and in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States, is strictly prohibited; but on the recommendation of the exchange council the commanding officer may permit beer and light wines—

In other words, it is not mandatory upon any post or any commander anywhere to have the exchange or canteen, but it is left to the council, advising the commandant, whoever he may be, and he makes the decision. No officer and no soldier is permitted to sell beer or wine or to serve in the canteen. All the money belongs to the soldier, and in two years the net profits accruing to the soldiers was nearly $600,000, which went to the improvement of the mess, in the language of the regulations. The bartender is a civilian, and he has a salary which is fixed.

There is no inducement for him to ask any soldier to take another drink. It does not increase his profits, but, on the contrary, if he keeps selling to a man until he is drunk he imperils his position and may lose it, because the soldiers themselves are interested in promoting sobriety in order that the comforts of the exchange may be maintained and not withdrawn by the commandant of the post on account of drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly restate the profit to the exchange, concerning which he has just made a statement?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir; I will do it with pleasure.

The aggregate receipts of the post exchanges therefore during the past two years has been $3,420,149.81, and the dividends $530,471.07. The net value of these exchanges—that is to say, the balance of their combined assets over their liabilities—was on June 30, 1899, $253,792.26.

That is what the report says. I wish to state that I am going entirely by the official report. I do not have any outside information whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the profit of the entire exchange?

Mr. MONEY. I said the exchange.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not for the liquor?

Mr. MONEY. I used the language "post exchange." I shall be very precise in my language, and it will not be misunderstood, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wanted to ask the Senator—I am sorry to interrupt him, but I should like the information——

Mr. MONEY. That is all right. I do not mind the interruption at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to inquire if there is any statement anywhere that he is aware of giving the profits of the liquor department of the post exchange?

Mr. MONEY. There is none that I know of segregated from the other, but I think the Senator will agree with me that the profits on beer are greater than on dry goods or canned meats or anything of that kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think that is likely, although I have never been in the business.

Mr. MONEY. None of the money goes to the Government. I will say now that the Government is not in the business of selling whisky, as the Senator stated in his speech. The United States does not sell anything to the soldier at all, but it permits, under certain wise regulations, in my opinion, beer and light wines to be sold, if the council and the commandant approve of it, and under no other circumstances.

Now, to proceed to what I consider the reasons which justify me in my vote, and not only justify me, but tell me to vote. I stand here responsible, so far as my vote carries me, and so does every other Senator, not only for the sobriety and the temperance, but the good health and the morale and the comfort of all the soldiers of the Army. I do not care how many churches and how many good people telegraph you to vote one way or the other, it does not relieve you in the least of your share of responsibility as to what may come upon the soldiers. I will show in a few minutes, by reading the record of six years before and six years after the establishment of the canteen, what the result has been. We can not dodge responsibility here. We may think we are doing it, but we do not. So far as I am concerned, I shall never try. I shall vote as I think right, and if the consequences are ill to me it does not hurt anybody else. The report goes on to say:

The practical question to be considered is not whether soldiers should drink or not—

That is it—

The practical question to be considered is not whether soldiers should drink or not drink, but whether they should be permitted to drink beer in the camp, surrounded by the restraining influences of discipline and good association, or whether they should be driven to drink bad whisky in the vile resorts which cluster around the limits of every military post and camp, and especially around those in which prohibition is maintained. I have no doubt that the present regulation furnishes the wise answer to this question.

That is very well said, in my opinion. I may be mistaken about it.

In order that the Secretary of War might be fully informed as to the effect, whether good or bad, upon the soldier of the establishment of the canteen a great many letters were sent to both commissioned and noncommissioned officers throughout the posts of the United States everywhere—in the Philippines, in Cuba, and everywhere else—and to those circulars of inquiry a thousand replies have been received. I will read now the questions which were asked of the commissioned and noncommissioned officers and their replies, to show the opinions of those who are on the ground, who are more interested in maintaining sobriety and discipline and good health in the Army than anybody else possibly can be, except the mothers and the relatives of the private soldiers themselves. Here are the questions:

What opportunity, if any, have you had to observe the workings of the canteen feature of the exchange system?

What, in your opinion, has been its effect upon the morality of the enlisted men?

What upon the discipline?

So far as your observation has gone, have desertions increased or lessened since its introduction?

Are trials by courts-martial more or less frequent?

I desire to pause right here to say that under the old system, as I am informed by Army officers, a man went outside to get a drink. They gave him one, and as long as he had a dollar in his pocket he was kept drinking, and then, reporting back for duty unconscious of the lapse of time, he was charged with desertion and sent to the penitentiary for anywhere from two to three or four to five years. That has been almost entirely done away with by the canteen.

Has drunkenness increased or lessened?

In your opinion, does the opportunity to procure beer on the post or in camps have any effect upon the efforts of enlisted men to procure intoxicants outside?

It has been asserted here that it induced men to go outside for intoxicants. We are going to hear what the officers, who are presumed to know, say upon that subject. There is no guesswork about it.

Are you in favor of such prohibition, or are you in favor of the exchange as conducted at present, and with a view to its continual improvement along the same lines?

They say they have had a thousand replies to the question.

What, in your opinion, has been the effect of the canteen feature of the exchange system upon the morality of the enlisted men?

That is about the most important point there is in it—the morality of the enlisted man.

By the bye, the hospital reports can tell a very interesting story about that feature of it:

Five hundred and eighty-two commissioned officers and 483 noncommissioned officers have replied. Of this number, 477 commissioned officers and 415 noncommissioned officers (892) have remarked that in their opinion its effect has been beneficial.

Eight hundred and ninety-two pronounce in favor of the canteen as improving the morality of the enlisted man. Then, on the other side, 17 commissioned officers and 18 noncommissioned officers say it is detrimental. That is 892 to 35, by officers, commissioned and noncommissioned, who see the men and who are presumed, if anybody can be, to be fully informed. Now, the next question:

What, in your opinion, has been its effect upon the discipline of the enlisted men?

I am not going into details, but I will give the total. Nine hundred and eight said it had been very beneficial; "resulted in improvement of the discipline," is the language here; and 19 commissioned officers and 21 noncommissioned officers said it had been detrimental. There is 908 to 40 in favor of the good effect of the canteen in the mere matter of discipline. Now the question:

Are trials by courts-martial more or less frequent since the introduction of the canteen feature of the exchange system?

Eight hundred and twenty-five have replied that they are less frequent to 20 that they are more frequent. That is the testimony as to courts-martial. Then the question:

Has drunkenness increased or lessened since the introduction of the canteen feature of the exchange system?

Nine hundred and nine have declared that it has decreased, while 20 have declared that it has increased; 909 to 20 in favor of the canteen putting down drunkenness in the Army. Then we get to the question:

In your opinion, does the opportunity to procure beer on the post or in camps have any effect upon the efforts of enlisted men to procure intoxicants outside?

It has been claimed over and over again that when a man got a drink inside, he had to go outside to finish up with some intoxicant. What is that? "Nine hundred and eighty have replied that it lessens such efforts," and eleven that it did not lessen such efforts. Nine hundred and eighty to eleven that the use of beer in the canteen lessened the desire and the attempt to get whisky on the outside of the compound or the encampment. Then the question:

What, in your opinion, would be the effect of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army?

That is a very searching question. That is the one we are going to vote on now. Also the question:

Are you in favor of such prohibition, or are you in favor of the exchange as conducted at present, and with a view to its continual improvement along the same lines?

Nine hundred and eighty-one out of the 1,000 have replied in favor of the canteen, and 17 commissioned officers and 19 noncommissioned officers, a total of 36, in favor of prohibition.

Now, gentlemen, here is the testimony of men who are answering an official inquiry from the head of the Army. These are the men who are responsible for the conduct of the Army, for the condition of the men, for their morality and their sobriety, for their discipline and their good conduct, less riotous conduct than when they go outside and get a drink of mean whisky, with other attachments. That is a pretty strong case, I think.

But I want to refer to the Judge-Advocate-General where he talks about desertions. I do not know that I shall be able to find it, because I can not find it unless it is marked. I want to state what it is. I recollect it substantially and not literally. It is that a man going outside of the post to get whisky generally gets too much whisky and he gets drunk; he is oblivious to the passage of time; he gets into a brawl, and either hurts a comrade and is tried for it and sent to the penitentiary or outlives his leave of absence and comes back not knowing how long he has been gone, charged with desertion, is tried for it, and put in the penitentiary; and a young fellow, a new recruit, perhaps, who is not accustomed to the allurements or the environments of the post, falls an easy victim to these fiends outside who set up these different traps to lead him down to hell. Consequently, before he knows it, perhaps as honest a man as ever lived, he is in the penitentiary upon the charge of desertion, when he never dreamt of any such thing. That has been lessened by the canteen, as I have shown.

Here are letters without number which I could read in favor of this, but I will not stop to read them. But I want to read what the official report says. I am going to read from a reply to these questions by Capt. Edward L. Munson, assistant surgeon, United States Army, Washington Barracks, D. C. I take this because he is right here, I presume, and can be interrogated as to whether or not this is his real opinion. I presume it is. It is said to be a portion of a book upon this subject, and I hope the book will be extensively read.

We all know very well that you are not going to make a man a temperance man by denying him what he wants when he can go over the line and get it in another place. Take, for example, the Senate. The sale of whisky and everything of that kind is forbidden in the Senate restaurant. What does it produce; temperance? No; an occasional spell of hard "cussing" from some thirsty man who wants a drink of whisky. That is all. He can take a two minutes' walk and get all he wants. It has never made a temperance man of a Senator yet because we have rules that he can not get a drink in the Senate restaurant. I think myself, without being hypercritical, that it is about as silly a rule as I ever heard of in my life. If we have not arrived at the years of discretion, we should resign and go home and let somebody else be sent here in our places.

Here is what the doctor says. I want to say that these comparisons were made of the six years preceding the establishment of the canteen in 1891 with the six years subsequent, and do not include any period of the war. It was the old Regular Army. The volunteers were not in. This regulation does not include the volunteers, either. We are providing a bill which is only for the Regular Army and not for the volunteers. Gentlemen, I do not believe there is a man in this Hall who more sincerely desires that not only soldiers, but everybody else, would quit drinking whisky, or anything else that does not do him good, than I do, and it is because I feel so much about it that I take the liberty of advocating the use of the canteen according to the report of the committee. This gentleman says:

The purpose of the canteen—

This is now the surgeon—

The purpose of the canteen, as officially announced, is to supply troops with goods at a low rate of profit and to afford rational recreation and amusement to all enlisted men. The sale of ardent spirts is strictly prohibited therein.

* * * * * * *

The effects of the introduction of the canteen system upon sick rates were prompt and marked.

I want you to note that language. Here is a scientific man who is accustomed to use the language of precision, and he says the "effects of the introduction of the canteen system upon sick rates were prompt and marked;" no gradual decrease, but immediate.

For the decade 1878-1887 the average number of admissions for alcoholism and its direct results amounted to 64.28 per thousand of white troops. This rate diminished during the next ten years in proportion as canteens were gradually established at various posts, omitting fractions, in the following ratio: 44, 46, 44, 44, 41, 37, 34, 32, 31, 30. On observing the admissions for alcoholism for the seven years, 1885-1891, which immediately preceded the general establishment of the canteen system upon a satisfactory basis, it is found that a yearly average of 1,214.8 men found it necessary to apply for treatment from this cause; while for the six years, 1892-1897, after canteens had been instituted throughout the Army, an average of only 923.4 men required attention for this reason—a reduction amounting to 23.6 per cent.

Now, that part of the record tells the story as to drunkenness and alcoholism—

In 1890 there were 17 posts at which the admission rate for alcoholism exceeded 10 per cent of the strength—

Just think of it, over 10 per cent of the command at 17 posts were treated for alcoholism. Their conveniences must have been very great—

In 1891 the number of such posts had decreased to 11, and in the six subsequent years diminished at the following rate—

Now, note this—

10, 7, 4, 5, 2, 2.

That shows what the canteen has done for alcoholism.

This favorable showing for the Army at large was duplicated in the case of each individual post, the introduction of the canteen in no instance failing to be promptly followed by a diminution of alcoholism. For certain stations this improvement was extraordinary. In 1889 Willets Point had an admission rate for alcoholism of 222.97 per 1,000. For 1890, the year when the canteen was established at that post, it fell to 157.50, and in the next year amounted to only 70.46. At Fort Spokane the amount of sickness resulting from intoxicants was reported by the surgeon as having diminished 50 per cent during the six months following the institution of the canteen.

In six months there was a diminution of 50 per cent, and he suggests further on in the report that there was a continual progression on this line of improvement.

At Fort Douglas in 1888 and 1889 the total number of admissions attributed to alcohol amounted to about 85 per 1,000 strength, while during 1892-1894 this rate fell to 52.95 per 1,000 strength, and such instances might be multiplied many fold.

It is the surgeon speaking. He is a man who is responsible for the health of the Army, and of course he uses all appliances and appurtenances which, in his opinion, will conduce to good results. Then he goes on to talk about the advantage of beer in the tropics, and gives some quotations from Manila, and so on. Then he says:

The cases of delirium tremens will be accepted by all as furnishing reliable data by which the gravity of the admissions for alcoholism may be determined. It is therefore of interest to observe that for the seven-year period above noted, prior to the complete adoption of the canteen system, the average annual admissions for this cause—actual numbers—was 23.8; while for the six-year period of peace following the establishment of this system the average number of men admitted yearly for delirium tremens was 16.6—a reduction of 31.3 per cent in this serious class of cases. It can scarcely be doubted that this remarkable decrease was chiefly influenced by the substitution of beer, a milder beverage—which rarely produces such effects—for the distilled liquors whose free use is well known to result in great mental excitement and nervous exhaustion.

It is recognized that alcoholism and insanity are closely related through the direct influence exerted by intoxicants in the production of mental aberration. Hence it is not surprising to find that the average number of cases annually coming under treatment was 35.1 for the seven-year period, 1885-1891, prior to the complete establishment of the canteen system, and only 24 as an annual average for the six subsequent years, 1892-1897.

Now, gentlemen, do not these figures, which no man in his senses can dispute, tell the whole story? Which is better for the soldier? I ask Senators, are you going to vote against this beneficent system, on which the health, and the temperance, and the morality, and the comfort of the soldier depend, because somebody at home who does not know what the record shows has requested you to vote against selling anything that is intoxicating to the soldier, even such a thing as beer. Some people think buttermilk will make you drunk if you drink enough of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that at the proper time I think I shall be able to disprove some of the statistics he has quoted or that certain other Senators have quoted. But I want now to call his attention to the fact that those of us who are against this proposed amendment are not arguing that we ought to go back to the old condition of things, which the Senator says was so much worse than the present, but we want to take a step forward and eliminate it altogether. I should like to have the Senator address himself to that phase of the question, whether he, as a temperance man, does not think that if we went one step forward we might still further decrease the number of soldiers going to hospitals and those suffering from alcoholism, insanity, and other unfortunate conditions.

Mr. MONEY. I think not, because we have the testimony as to the condition when there was no canteen, and that is exactly what I have been reading to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But there was a post trader, a sutler, in connection with the Army at that time.

Mr. MONEY. He was prohibited from selling whisky. He could not sell ardent spirits.

Mr. GALLINGER. But he did.

Mr. MONEY. That is a question which has got to be proved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. MONEY. A mere statement will not go down, because the Senator can not possibly know it of his own knowledge. We can only take the official papers on which to make a statement here, and I will not make a statement that is not backed up by the record of the Army.

Now, I ask Senators if we can not accept the statement here of the General of the Army, or the Secretary of War, or the Adjutant-General, or the surgeons of the Army, then I want to know to what quarter we will turn for information?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the General in Command of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Army, and the Adjutant-General of the Army have testified on both sides of this question, and the Senator must know it.

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me; I did not know it. I accept it as a matter of information that is quite interesting; but nevertheless I understand that the very last thing they did say was in favor of the canteen. Here is the printed record at least, and I am going by the printed record.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit me one moment?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I will suggest that the testimony of the Surgeon-General of the Army, the testimony of the General of the Army, who, by the way, initiated the movement for the abolition of the old tradership, and the testimony of the Adjutant-General all happened to be given against the canteen before it was instituted. In the light of experience they have changed their views, and they have so stated.

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly the remark I was about to make, that they were talking before taking and after taking.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the canteen was established in 1889, and the Adjutant-General of the Army gave his opinion in 1899 against it.

Mr. MONEY. In 1891.

Mr. GALLINGER. In 1892 and again in 1899.

Mr. MONEY. The canteen was established in 1891, according to the official document here.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was in 1899.

Mr. MONEY. Now we get down to what the surgeon says about good order:

The canteen, for the maintenance of good order in which a commissioned officer is held responsible, is an aid to discipline as well as to the health and morals of troops. It provides a resort which, while under thorough military control, offers inducements to the men to remain at home and spend their idle time within the limits of the post; this condition obviously being far preferable to the one formerly existing, when the nearest and generally patronized places of amusement and refreshment were the grogshops, usually with brothel annexes, which marked the limits of each military reservation.

Now, that is before taking. That is what the surgeon says, speaking from his experience, his personal observation, and his treatment of the men in the character of a physician. He has tried it both ways. He is the man I am quoting here, and he seems to be a man of such reputation for ability that he is now writing a book on this question. What I read is simply an extract from his forthcoming book, but it is also an answer to the inquiry made by the Adjutant-General.

Except with the most dissolute class of men the soldier is well satisfied to patronize the canteen to the exclusion of outside saloons, knowing as he does that he receives good value for his money in articles of excellent quality, and fully appreciating that the profits of the institution ultimately accrue entirely to his benefit, and are not, as with the case of outside tradesmen, diverted to the advantage of others. Besides the congenial resort which it furnishes, the influence of the profits of the canteen in promoting contentment among troops can scarcely be overestimated, contributing as they do to improvement of the food, the attainment of wholesome amusement, and the provision of much by which the soldier's life is made less irksome and he himself rendered more efficient in the performance of his military duties.

That is as far as that goes.

Now, I am going to come to the percentage of desertions from the Army. Desertion from the Army is one of those offenses that carries with it a certain moral obloquy. No man ever looked with patience upon a deserter from the Army. I do not care what his record had been, whenever he deserted he wiped out all the glories of his past achievements and stamped himself upon the minds of his contemporaries as a man of moral turpitude, at least, if not worse. Now, what were the desertions up to the canteen establishment? Here is the table giving the percentages:

Year.	Average strength.	Deserted.	Per cent.
1885	24,816	2,626	10.6
1886	24,365	2,012	8.3
1887	24,438	2,525	10
1888	24,790	2,678	11
1889	25,504	2,730	11
1890	24,930	1,923	7.7
1891	24,525	1,398	5.7
Average for 7 years before canteen system was thoroughly established			9.18
1892	24,869	1,410	5.7
1893	25,670	1,632	6.3
1894	25,661	926	3.6
1895	25,209	1,341	5.3
1896	25,143	858	3.4
1897	25,300	726	2.9
Average for 6 years after canteen system was thoroughly established			4.53

That is as to desertions. So the canteen has certainly helped that matter.

From the above table it is observed that during the first year after the canteen system was authorized the rate of desertions fell 26 per cent—

A pretty good decrease for the first year—while in the next year the rate was further reduced to 49 per cent.

So we certainly improved the Army in that respect.

For the five years previous to the establishment of the first officially recognized canteen the number of men annually deserting from the service, per thousand strength, amounted to 101—

Just think of it, an Army loses 101 men by desertions out of every thousand every year.

While for the eight years immediately subsequent to the institution of this system the annual number of desertions was reduced to 50 per thousand strength. The decrease since noted has been practically progressive—

That is, the desertions are getting less and less frequent.

and for the two years immediately prior to the war with Spain scarcely one-fourth the number of men, as compared with the three years immediately prior to the introduction of the canteen system, found the military service so uncongenial as to desire to escape from completing their terms of enlistment. These results are certainly most gratifying—

No, they are not; they are not gratifying to very many people who are sorry that the canteen has not resulted in general drunkenness.

These results are certainly most gratifying, and there is no reason for believing that with the development of the canteen along its legitimate lines of growth a still further decrease in the present small rate of desertions may not be confidently anticipated.

Well, I confidently anticipate it. I confidently anticipate the improvement of the morals of the Army in all the particulars to which these questions are directed, and the reason for my confidence is found in the reports which I am reading now. I will place these official reports of the men, and the only men, who can know anything about it, the men who are most concerned about it, against every humanitarian theory that was ever held in the world by persons who want to do right, who want to promote temperance. I want to give them credit for everything, and I want to say that I am in no respect half as good as any of the good women who have asked for this legislation. I think I am a great deal better than most of the men, but I give them credit for wanting what I want.

Drunkenness is certainly prevented by the constant military supervision to which the canteen is subjected. The men themselves are usually careful not to indulge alcoholics to the point of inebriety, while such few individuals as are inclined to be forgetful of the dangers of excess will usually be restrained by companions, or by those connected with the canteen, from passing the bounds of actual intoxication.

Why? Because the soldier who enjoys the canteen soberly knows that he will be deprived of its comforts, and its facilities, and its congenial companionship if it gets a bad name for drunkenness. Therefore, he will not permit a comrade to take a drink too much, and the civilian who sells the drink, who has no sort of share in the profits of the concern, who gets a fixed salary, knows he will lose his job if he gets a man drunk. Then the whole thing is conducted under the eye of an officer, who goes around occasionally and says, "Boys, how are you getting on? Is everything going on right here? Is everything comfortable? I'm glad to see you all;" and so on.

Hence brawls and disturbances, with resulting court-martial, have, since the introduction of the canteen system, become relatively infrequent—

Now, that is a good point—

Hence brawls and disturbances, with resulting court-martial, have, since the introduction of the canteen system, become relatively infrequent, and pay day, formerly synonymous with debauchery and riotous disturbance, is now scarcely to be distinguished by its effects from any other day.

That is what your canteen has effected for the post.

As illustrating the marked reduction of convictions for drunkenness, or complications arising therefrom, since the establishment of the canteen, the following figures, from the reports of the Judge-Advocate-General, are of interest:

Perhaps the Judge-Advocate-General has changed his opinion, but whether he has or not, here is the report he makes to the Secretary of War, and we have got to take it as meaning all that he says. Then he goes on through certain years here:

Year.	Total number of trials and convictions in the Army.	Number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom.
1886	1,640	342
1887	1,730	289
1888	1,999	357
1889	1,752	423
1890	1,907	407
1891	2,000	417
1892	2,198	223
1893	2,189	163
1894	1,728	120
1895	1,486	142
1896	1,384	108
1897	1,245	143
Now, this is an important point—
Average for the 6 years 1886-1891	1,838	372.5
Average for the 6 years 1892-1897	1,605	160.6

I read further:

From the above figures it is evident that, coincident with the thorough establishment of the canteen system, there has occurred a decrease amounting to considerably more than one-half the drunkenness, which formerly tended to the impairment of discipline, the demoralization of individuals, and to the occurrence of assaults, injuries, and deaths. It is idle to deny that this excellent result has not been largely due to the attraction furnished by the canteen, combined with the military discipline which prevails in that institution and which reduces to a minimum the possibility of dangerous excesses.

The influence of this institution in promoting order and contentment is less directly, though none the less positively, shown by the number of soldiers making savings deposits with Army paymasters.

Then it goes on:

It is claimed—

Now, I ask the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will oblige me, to this one sentence in the remarks of the surgeon—

It is claimed by the advocates of total abstinence that by the sale of beer in the canteen the health and morals of the soldiers are impaired; that such tacit encouragement on the part of the Government favors indulgence in alcoholics and that drinking habits are thus formed by those who might otherwise have remained sober men. These objections are purely theoretical and and are at variance with facts as observed since the establishment of the canteen. The sale of beer, under suitable restrictions, undoubtedly results in good rather than evil to the troops at large and may properly be looked upon as a safety valve for those accustomed to look upon the use of a certain amount of liquor as both harmless and proper.

* * * * * * * *

That beer drinking, viewed in the abstract, is unproductive of good will be admitted by all—

I say so, as well as the Senator from New Hampshire, and the best women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, as well as the best of divines who ever entered the pulpit. I say to drink anything is bad, and I do not drink, and I do not want anyone to drink unless he feels like it; and if he does, I do not intend to prevent him. Here is what the surgeon says:

That beer drinking, viewed in the abstract, is unproductive of good will be admitted by all: that, when properly controlled, its sale in canteens, rather than its prohibition, redounds to the general health, morals, and military efficiency few, if any, who are conversant with the subject would attempt to deny.

The trouble is it is denied by those who are not conversant with the subject, by people who have good theories of religion, people who lead Christian lives and pure lives, who come to us with a theory that suits them, but it does not suit the soldier. The soldier does not join the temperance society. He is simply one of the body politic who goes out of civil life and enrolls himself under the flag; that is all. He is simply a human being, and he has the same appetite when he gets into camp that he had in the village or farm or the workshop or whatever it may be that he has just left. He is just the same man, and he is to be treated as a responsible creature; and when we find that total prohibition encourages drunkenness and has all other sorts of demoralizing results, and that the sale of beer in the canteen promotes good results, it is our business to vote for it, in my opinion, and I shall take the liberty to do it anyway.

It is certainly unfortunate that the temperance element in civil life—

Now, here is coming home—

It is certainly unfortunate that the temperance element in civil life, which is so constantly endeavoring to enact legislation against the sale of alcoholics of any character in the military service, can not be brought to regard the matter from the practical rather than the sentimental aspect, and thus assist in controlling and largely curtailing an evil which it is powerless to prevent and which, if its efforts toward restrictive legislation should be successful, would undoubtedly be greatly increased.

Now, that is what the learned doctor says about that. It is an extract from the book, which he is willing to submit to the literary criticism of the world and to the criticism also of his professional friends; a man who must be careful in what he says, because he must take criticism, and a good deal of it, both from a literary and from a professional standpoint, but he submits this as the best thought in him after his long personal observation and treatment of soldiers from the effect of whisky.

Now, Mr. President, that is the case as I make it from official records. I have nothing in the world outside. I have not taken the good wishes of the dreamer; I have simply gone for facts, and that is where every lawyer ought to go, upon which to base an argument. As I said at the beginning, this argument is not intended to convince anyone, but it is intended to show the people whom I have the honor to represent a good and substantial reason for the vote I shall cast here that I desire exactly what they desire, but that the ways and means which they tell me to pursue are not those that my judgment says are the best.

Therefore, Mr. President, believing that the canteen is a good thing for the soldier, believing that its abolition would increase drunkenness, alcoholism, mental aberration, insanity, disease, discomfort, inconvenience, lack of discipline, loss of days in the service of the country, and general degradation of the individual, I shall stand here and speak for the soldier and vote for him, for he is first to be considered. It makes no difference to me who is pleased or who is displeased. Are we responsible for the well-being of the soldier or not? You can not shake off the reins of responsibility and get behind a lot of telegrams and letters sent to you by somebody who has no responsibility whatever in the matter.

It is well enough to say that you want to please your constituents. Every Senator wants to do that. I want to please my constituents. But I am never going to sacrifice my sense of duty to please anyone, I do not care who it is. I am going to do just exactly as I think is right. I have pursued that course for a long time and I have never yet been called to account for doing it, even by those who had been against me and whose requests I was compelled to deny. No man here in the Senate or in the House, which passed this bill by such an overwhelming majority, has higher respect for the church or for the influence of the women of the country.

I know that the women are the great corrective principle in human society, and without them and their influence we would become a lot of savages. I have been a soldier; I have been in mining camps; I have been amongst sailors, and wherever woman is excluded the man rises very little above the brute. I understand all that, and I understand that women, with their strong subjective minds, very rarely make a mistake on moral questions. They do not reason, as men do, to an end. The emotions all belong to the subjective mind, and it is the objective mind that reasons from given facts to certain conclusions that must control. You will find that painters, musicians, orators, the great architects, all classes of genius who get their inspiration from the subjective mind, from the emotions, have led very irregular lives. History teaches us that. The objective mind is not strong enough in its reasoning faculties to control the appetites or the suggestions of the subjective mind.

Mr. President, I shall have something more to say about this bill before we get through with it, but this is one of the amendments of the committee to which I can give my hearty concurrence. From the bottom of my soul I believe, if it is stricken out and the bill remains as sent here by the other House, I would—I will not say what I was about to say, as it might be considered disrespectful to that honorable body; but I say if we strike this out, in my opinion, we shall very soon be regretting it, and while you have heard from a great many to-day in favor of this thing, you will hear from ten times as many in five or six years if you do not vote for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate but a very few minutes in the further discussion of this amendment.

It was not necessary for the amiable and distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to tell the Senate that he is entirely sincere in the advocacy of the amendment; neither is it necessary for us on the other side of the question to assure the Senate that we are equally sincere. It was not necessary for the Senator from Mississippi to even suggest that those of us who are opposed to this amendment are being influenced by outside parties or outside considerations, and that——

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I hope the Senator has not so poor an opinion of me as to suppose that I intended to reflect upon the sincerity of the Senators who take the other side of this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, I know the Senator would not intentionally have done so, and I very gladly acquit him of any such purpose; and yet when the Senator reads his remarks in the RECORD, I feel sure he will observe that I had entire warrant in calling the attention of the Senate to some utterances that fell from his lips.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, of course in what I said I only intended to say that some of my friends had told me that they were yielding to public sentiment at home upon this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then we meet on common ground so far as the matter of sincerity is concerned. We are discussing a great question upon a ground upon which all honest and right-minded men can stand, whatever their convictions or opinions may be.

Two or three matters have been mentioned in the debate to which I shall very briefly call attention. In the first place, it has been asserted vehemently, and with apparent authority, that since the canteen was established desertions in the Army have been 40 per cent less than they were previous to that time, and that the number of soldiers treated in hospitals has been 40 per cent less than previous to that time. I will in a moment call attention to the fallacy of that reasoning.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] said that American soldiers should not be put in a reformatory, that young Americans would not volunteer under such conditions. Well, Mr. President, that is precisely the condition that exists in the Navy to-day; and, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, when he says that sailors can not step off the ship on the ocean to go to a grogshop and get drink, I want to say that our ships are in port a much larger portion of the time than they are sailing on the broad seas. So that argument has not very much force.

I was interrogated about this naval order and was not at the time very well prepared to answer. I have now the data. It was during the civil war that the time-honored grog ration of the Navy was abolished. The custom of serving drink to sailors and of issuing extra grog rations before battle is as old as the naval history of the Anglo-Saxon race, but in July, 1862, Congress passed a law abolishing that custom in the American Navy. The language of the act was:

That from and after the 1st day of September, 1862, the spirit ration in the Navy of the United States shall forever cease, and thereafter no distilled spirituous liquors shall be admitted on board of vessels of war except as medical stores and upon the order and under the control of the medical officers of such vessels, and to be used only for medical purposes.

From and after the 1st day of September next there shall be allowed and paid to each person in the Navy now entitled to the spirit ration 5 cents per day in commutation and lieu thereof, which shall be in addition to the present pay.

A very wise provision; and if we give our soldiers 5 cents per day in addition to their present pay, as is given to the sailors under this law, it seems to me that it would make up the profits that they are now getting from the sale of spirituous liquors in the canteens.

In addition to this, Secretary Long, who is a well-known temperance man, under date of February 3, 1899, issued General Orders, No. 508, which reads:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 508.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 3, 1899.

After mature deliberation the Department has decided that it is for the best interest of the service that the sale or issue to enlisted men of malt or other alcoholic liquors on board ships of the Navy, or within the limits of naval stations, be prohibited.

Therefore, after the receipt of this order, commanding officers and commandants are forbidden to allow any malt or other alcoholic liquor to be sold to, or issued to, enlisted men, either on board ship, or within the limits of navy-yards, naval stations, or marine barracks, except in the medical department.

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Mr. President, it seems to me that no trouble has come from this prohibition. There has been no difficulty about enlistments in the Navy so far as I know, and it seems to me that what is good for the sailor may be good for the soldier.

There is a good deal of testimony that might be cited on the part of prominent naval officers in favor of total abstinence in the Navy. Rear-Admiral Sampson is on record as saying:

I think there is but one opinion among officers of the Navy about grog, and it is that alcoholic liquors have no place in the Navy of the United States except as a medicine. Intoxicating liquors of all sorts should be abolished.

Commodore Gibbs gives very emphatic testimony. He says:

In my opinion there can be no question that the public good would be greatly enhanced by the exclusion of alcoholic drink, as a beverage, from both Army and Navy circles. The man who needs the stimulus of alcoholic liquor to enable him to perform his duty is not to be trusted in any capacity. In my experience of nearly fifty years as an officer in the United States Navy I think I can safely say that 90 per cent of all punishments inflicted on board ship that have come under my observation can be traced directly to rum.

Rear-Admiral Kimberly, a very distinguished naval officer, says:

I should say, as a naval man, that alcoholic liquor could be dispensed with with advantage, except for medical purposes.

In the Navy the grog ration has been abolished for years and coffee substituted in the early morning before any work is done. I look upon alcoholic drinks as medicine, and they should only be used as such.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] quoted Colonel Patrick, of the Dayton Soldiers' Home, who, he says, is a strong prohibitionist, but who, notwithstanding, believes in the canteen. Mr. President, whenever I hear of a strong prohibitionist who believes in liquor selling it reminds me of that old man down in Maine who said he was "for a prohibitory law, but agin its enforcement." That seems to be about the situation that Colonel Patrick is in. He is a prohibitionist who does not believe in the sale or use of intoxicating drinks, but believes in the canteen, where intoxicating liquors are sold. His testimony is not very important.

Mr. President, great stress has been laid upon certain so-called statistics in the discussion of this question by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. It has been asserted over and over again that crime has decreased 40 per cent since the canteen was established and that the number of persons in hospital has decreased 40 per cent. I turn to the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, from which copious extracts have been made, and on page 40 I find the table the Senator from Connecticut used to illustrate what he said were facts, and what do I find? Let it be borne in mind that the canteen was established in 1890. I turn to this table, and I find under one caption, "Total number of trials and convictions in the Army," that in 1886 there were 1,640; in 1887, 1,730; in 1888, 1,999; in 1889, 1,752; making a total of 7,121 trials and convictions in the Army during the four years previous to the establishment of the canteen. Now, we take 1890, and there were 1,907; in 1891, 2,000; in 1892, 2,198; in 1893, 2,189, or a total of 8,294.

So that there was an increase of "trials and convictions" during the first four years after the canteen was established of 1,173, being an increase of about 16 per cent in the "trials and convictions" during the four years that the canteen was established, as compared with the four years prior to its establishment, instead of a decrease of 40 per cent.

It is true that under the head of "number of trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom," a very elastic suggestion, there was a slight decrease. In 1886 there were 342; in 1887, 289; in 1888, 357, and in 1889, 423, while in 1890 there were 407; in 1891, 417; in 1892, 228, and in 1893, 163. The first table shows a total of 1,411 and the second table of 1,215, showing that there was an increase of about 15 per cent of "trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom," while there was an increase of the total number of "trials and convictions in the Army."

I submit, Mr. President, that this does not sustain the contention that there was a decrease of 40 per cent after the canteen had been established, there being an increase of the total number of "trials and convictions" and a slight decrease in the "trials and convictions for drunkenness and conditions arising therefrom."

I think, Mr. President, that is all I care to say about this matter. There are some other points that might well be considered, but other Senators will doubtless take them up. I wish to say, however, that I am extremely gratified that this debate is proceeding along the lines it is. I am glad that Senators are thoughtfully addressing themselves to this question, whether they agree with me or not.

The debate will go out to the country; it will be read by the men and women of this nation, who are thoughtful people, whether they are moved by sentiment or by conviction, and it will have an educating effect upon them. It will lead them to investigate this matter for themselves; and I trust it may direct their attention to the physiological, economic, and scientific aspects of the case, and that they may the better prepare themselves for good citizenship by carefully scanning the expressions of Senators who have given some little thought to this question.

Whatever the outcome may be, Mr. President, I shall have no regrets that it was my privilege to participate in the discussion, and that I have had an opportunity once more in the Senate of the United States of putting myself on record as against the sale and use of intoxicating drinks in all forms.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I do not suppose that any amount of discussion on this subject would result in the change of a single vote one way or the other. Men's minds are pretty well made up on propositions of this kind, and I do not regard a lengthy debate here as necessary in reaching a final conclusion. It does seem to me, however, as if there should be some slight reference made to the legislative history of this case.

Two years ago, or nearly so, this question came up in the House of Representatives, and a provision was inserted in the Army bill of 1898 prohibiting what is known as the canteen. The bill came to the Senate and was referred in regular order to the Committee on Military Affairs, where, after due consideration, the House provision was stricken out. When the bill was reported to the Senate I had the honor to offer as an amendment the House provision, with some slight changes, and it was adopted by the Senate without discussion or division.

When the present measure came up in the other House last month the same anti-canteen clause, with a few changes intended to meet the objections that were found by the Attorney-General to the original anti-canteen legislation, was proposed, and was there adopted by a very large majority. The bill then came to the Senate, and the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has reported an amendment which admits of the sale of beer, which, of course, puts continued life into the institution known as the canteen. So much for the legislative history of the matter.

Something has been said here in regard to the vital statistics in the Army as influenced by the liquor that is allowed to be sold to the soldier. I have here some figures which, it seems to me, should go into this debate, because they are both pertinent and important. These statistics show that from May 1, 1898, to June 30, 1899, the average military strength of the regular soldiers in the Army was 56,218, and the average military strength of the volunteers was 112,041, there being nearly twice as many volunteers as regulars.

I refer to this by way of illustrating the fact, as it seems to me, that the volunteers, being drawn from the homes throughout the country and being under the influence of the reforms that are practiced in those homes, are not perhaps as susceptible to disease, insanity, etc., as are the regulars in the Army who are under the constant influence of the canteen. I think that is the logical conclusion to be drawn from these figures.

Between the above dates—that is, between May 1, 1898, and June 30, 1899—among the regulars 1 officer and 32 enlisted men committed suicide; and among the volunteers, with more than double the number, 1 officer and 20 enlisted men committed suicide. Among 56,000 regulars 26 soldiers died from murder or homicide, and among the 112,000 volunteers the same number, 26, died from murder or homicide. Among the regulars 924 men were dishonorably discharged by sentence of general court-martial, and 508 amongst twice as many volunteers. Amongst 56,218 regulars, in the above period, 3,036 deserted, while out of twice as many volunteers only 2,736 deserted.

Reference has been made here this afternoon to the position taken by various army officers on this subject, and it has been alleged that the Adjutant-General of the Army has been both for and against the institution of the canteen. That, I believe, is not denied; but it is alleged that the Adjutant-General was against the canteen prior to its inauguration as an institution in the Army, and that he is now in favor of it after having seen the workings thereof. I think it well that General Corbin should be accurately quoted on that point.

The canteen existed in 1892, and was at that time rapidly succeeding what was known as the trader's store of the army post. Every Western Senator understands what the post trader's store was in the army posts of the West. The post trader's store, or some building that was attached thereto, coming within the supervision of the post trader, it is well understood was merely a liquor saloon, where liquor was dispensed freely and without restraint. I have been in those Western military posts, and know whereof I speak.

The canteen succeeded the military post trader's liquor saloon of the early days. I have no doubt that it was an improvement over the post trader's store, perhaps a considerable improvement, but certainly the Adjutant-General of the Army knew of the influence and effect of the post trader's store when he spoke in 1892 of the canteen and said:

> A cause of restlessness (in the Army) is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good and should be done away with without further experiment. The sale of beer superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval. The men who drink spend the greater portion of their money for beer. The credit system brings them to the pay table with little or no money due. This takes all heart out of them and makes them quite ready to ask their discharge and try some other calling.

This was the evidence of the present Adjutant-General in 1892, and I am informed that he held to that opinion up to about the time that the unfortunate construction placed upon the law of 1898 was issued, when he is said to have changed and to have come over to a belief in the canteen system.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact—and not in a spirit of criticism—that the Committee on Military Affairs, in their report to this body, has placed in that report about everything that came before that committee in favor of this amendment; in other words, in favor of the sale of beer or in favor of the canteen; but I find very little material in the report of the committee on the side of those who do not believe in the canteen.

It is a somewhat remarkable fact, it seems to me, that in Report No. 1771 we find the evidence of the Secretary of War, the letter of the Adjutant-General, and the testimony of various commanding officers in the Philippine Islands in favor of the canteen, but we do not find in the same report anything from those who declared against the canteen; and, on this account, I was led to believe that perhaps all the Army officers had come over to the side of liquor.

It was such a remarkable condition of things that I looked it up, and I find upon investigation that quite a number of Army officers reported to the Secretary of War against the canteen, but their statements were not put in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not think it was exactly fair to the Senate, and for that reason I propose to insert in my remarks and to read from many of the statements made by Army officers who are opposed to the canteen.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Were any of the officers who reported against the canteen heard before the committee?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not know as to that.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I make a remark?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. All the talk about the canteen is in one pamphlet. The Senator will find on page 37 of the pamphlet a list of officers who favor it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are two reports, it seems, from the Military Committee, one of them embracing the hearings on the canteen question, and that report contains the testimony on both sides of the question. The other report, the one to which I called attention a while ago, Report No. 1771, does not contain anything derogatory to the canteen, but does embrace about everything there is in favor of it. That is what I referred to. I do not criticise the committee. I am referring to it as a fact, and it makes it rather awkward for Senators who desire to read both sides of the question.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator certainly must be satisfied with the large amount of the committee report that is devoted to the canteen. About nine-tenths of it is on the canteen question. I suppose the Senator's objection is that they did not give more on the canteen question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. My objection is that in the regular report of the committee everything that is there on the canteen question is in favor of it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is nine times as much as there is about anything else.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I make no objection to the amount on the subject that may be found in the report.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator, then, would not object to having these hearings, that give both sides, printed, together with the other part of the hearings, so that persons who want to read both sides can get it when they write to us?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. You would be obliged to get both reports to do that.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator knows the trouble of furnishing them when they are not printed together, and especially when one is not printed as a Senate document. If the Senator will not object, at this point I should like to offer a concurrent resolution, to be printed and lie on the table, to be called up in the morning, providing for the printing of them together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask to have it read?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; let it be read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a Senate document 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on Army bill (S. 4300), of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. That covers the whole thing?

Mr. BUTLER. That is all there is.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUTLER. It is part of the hearing, is it not? The resolution calls for the printing in one document of the hearings before the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it is a concurrent resolution, I suggest to the Senator that he add the hearings before the House committee, if they had any.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not object to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The resolution will go to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be glad to have it amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that amendment, if it is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Say before the committees of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I will amend the resolution so as to call for the printing in one document of all the hearings before the Senate committee and all the hearings before the House committee on this subject.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope this discussion will not proceed at great length. I desire to finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is entitled to the floor. The Chair understood him to yield for this purpose.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Do I understand that the Senator from North Carolina has concluded?

Mr. BUTLER. The clerks are perfecting the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina wishes to have the resolution modified. As modified it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a Senate document 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and the House on Army bill (S. 4300), of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the resolution is plain enough, but I wish to have it understood that it calls for the printing in one document of the hearings before both committees, the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator does not object, I will ask for unanimous consent that it may be passed now.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think it had better go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offered a resolution, by instruction of the committee, to have 3,000 copies of the report printed. I think I ought to move to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was passed, because you are proposing to print everything in one volume. Is that it?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that motion rest.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let that motion rest.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I was calling attention to the scattered condition of the testimony that has been given on this subject. I desire to say, however, that the testimony is not all one-sided. What I shall now read is taken from the report of the Secretary of War for 1899, and in answer to the question, "What, in your opinion, would be the effect of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army? Are you in favor of such prohibition, or are you in favor of the exchange as conducted at present?"

I will say that this interrogatory was sent out by the Secretary of War after the canteen had become a very live topic of debate in this country, after the passage of the act of 1898. I suppose that all the Army officers to whom this inquiry was sent replied. I find quite a number of the replies in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I find a great number of replies in the report of the Secretary of War. I propose to read briefly from some of those replies, and I will ask that they be inserted in full in my remarks. The first of these replies is from Capt. William F. Stewart, commanding Battery E, and he says:

Beneficial. I am in favor of abolishing the exchange.

The next is from First Lieut. Ira A. Haynes, commanding Battery G. He says:

There would probably be more trials for absence without leave, and more deserting for a while, but I believe on the whole the effect would be good. No man can predict with certainty. I am in favor of giving such prohibition a fair trial. I have served three terms (each of several months) as exchange officer, two at Washington, D. C., and one at Fort McPherson, Ga. I have also served for several years in posts where canteens were in existence.

Suitable buildings should, I think, be erected and kept in thorough repair by the Government. The steward should be paid sufficient salary to procure the services of a thoroughly good man. This also applies in some degree to the attendants, but is especially important in the case of the steward. The matter of dividend to the organizations sharing in the exchange should not be considered. I believe that the ration should be made such as to obviate the necessity for this means of increasing the company fund.

Mr. President, much stress has been laid upon the fact that the chief purpose of the canteen is to raise a fund out of which the soldiers might purchase the necessary luxuries of their Army life, and which are not issued as rations. In one instance, I believe, referred to by the Senator from New Jersey, it is shown that something like $1,800 was raised as the result of the operation of the canteen or post exchange.

I think this was at the Military Academy. Of course, if it is a question of luxuries for the soldiers, the luxuries can be measured only by the amount of beer they may drink. I have no doubt if the canteen should succeed, if it should receive sufficient encouragement, that after a while the soldiers might be taught to drink a sufficient amount of beer to pay the entire expenses of their sustenance.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they did not spend their money for beer, they could buy the luxuries.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It seemed to me that that would be the inference. I thought it unnecessary to refer to it directly. Senators can see for themselves that if the soldiers saved their money instead of spending it for beer they might buy something more than the necessary luxuries. They might be able to send a little of the money they earn back to their parents or to their poor relatives.

Then we have the testimony of Second Lieut. Edward Kimmel, commanding Battery G. He says:

To a certain considerable extent would lessen the use of beverage and to that extent the effect would be beneficial. Am in favor of the prohibition. In my opinion, there is no good to be derived from the use of beer. On the other hand, it has a degrading influence on the soldier physically, intellectually, and morally. The soldier may obtain beer in some other way, but the Government should not counteract its own efforts toward the making of a good soldier by supplying that which will impair his efficiency.

It seems to me that the argument of those who advocate the prohibition of the canteen is contained in a nutshell in that statement.

Capt. E. H. Catlin, commanding Battery I, says:

I have been stationed at posts where canteens existed for ten years. It seems to me contrary to good morals to give official sanction to the sale of alcoholic drinks to soldiers, especially to recruits, some of whom in the canteen acquire the taste for drink that ruins them, a taste that they would not acquire elsewhere. The fact that it is considered inexpedient for soldiers to sell beer is enough to condemn its sale by civilians. To myself personally it is repugnant to have any connection with the management of the beer feature of the exchange, which is a catering to men's lower tendencies.

Then there is the statement of Capt. William Stanton, commanding Troop C, to the same effect:

There would be less drunkenness at the post, and, I think, no more in the town or other places near the post. I am in favor of such prohibition. The canteen at a post is a temptation to many who would not take the trouble to go outside the post for a drink. This is especially the case with young men who have not formed the habit of drinking; even men of intemperate habits might often be prevented from getting drunk if intoxicants were not so conveniently placed within their reach.

The plea that you can limit the amount of beer sold to a man in the canteen is fallacious. The bartender who will refuse a man beer when he thinks he has had enough will, I suspect, be hard to find. I believe that the exchange without the canteen can not be maintained, and in consequence the profit now enjoyed by the companies must cease, and it is to this fact I attribute much of the support which the canteen receives from officers of the Army.

Here is the statement of Capt. F. Wheeler, commanding Troop E. He says:

I have observed the workings of the canteen feature of the exchange system while serving as canteen officer for six months and on canteen council frequently, being in the service and on duty at post all but nine months since canteen was started in 1890. I have no objection to the moderate use of liquor, but its sale by the Government is not, in my opinion, advantageous to the discipline or morals of a command, particularly when sold on credit. The detail of soldiers in the post exchange is demoralizing to them. Many men who would not pay cash for liquor will take that or anything else on credit.

In the statement of Capt. G. H. Paddock, commanding Troop F, I find the following:

A good effect, especially in this hot climate, where drinking is so injurious. The only excuse, in my opinion, for the canteen was to improve the mess. Now that the ration is good and sufficient, I am in favor of the total prohibition of the sale of intoxicants of all kinds. Have observed for several years the workings of the canteen at several different posts. I have been a successful exchange officer at several posts, as the records will show, and I have done everything in the power of an officer to make the system a success. Yet it is my deliberate opinion that the ease with which intoxicants can be obtained at a post exchange has a tendency to make men, especially young soldiers, drink who would not do so otherwise.

In the best-managed exchanges the part where beer is sold is frequented and occupied by the "old soaks" of the command, whose blear eyes and profane ribald jests have nothing but an injurious effect upon the decent (always the large) element of a regular command. When no exchange is at a station, none but the worst element of a troop will frequent the public saloons, or, if they do, will do so very seldom; but the exchange saloon or portion of the exchange where beer is sold, being authorized by law and to that extent made respectable, is more frequented. The argument usually made that men will have their drink is absurd. Our men join us quite young, and if no liquor is in sight they do not think of it. The few old soaks of the Army are of more use in the guardhouse than in line. I do not think that their appetite for liquor should be considered.

Also:

In my opinion the effect of absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army can not be otherwise than salutary and beneficial to all, especially to the younger men. I am in favor of absolute prohibition of the sale of all intoxicants of every nature upon any military post.

W. A. MARYE,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Ordnance.

U. S. ARSENAL, Fort Monroe, Va., May 19, 1899.

Lieut. Col. H. W. Wessells, jr., commanding regiment: It would help the decency of the service. I am unalterably opposed to saloons and saloon keepers. I never can or will believe in saloons or saloon keepers, call them by what euphemistic names you please.

Then we have the statement of Capt. Luigi Lomia, commanding Battery H. He says:

I think it would be a good thing. I am in favor of the post exchange with the canteen feature in it eliminated. Billiards, coffee, soda water, ice cream, lunches, etc., might be sold the men with profit. I have observed the workings of the canteen feature of the exchange more especially since promoted to captain (1894, February 3).

As battery commander I have been informed many times that many of the young men who come in the service would let beer and all other intoxicants alone were it not for the fear of being considered "mean"—that is, the old soldier in some way or other gets the younger soldier to spend money on them, although "treating" is prohibited. Thus young men acquire the taste for drink that if the opportunity were not afforded might never acquire such a taste. In my opinion drink in ninety cases out of one hundred is at the bottom of all of a soldier's trouble.

Also:

Capt. W. C. Brown, commanding Troop E: The number of cases of men being violently drunk would probably be increased somewhat, particularly in localities where there are rum shops immediately outside the limits of military reservations. The prohibition of the sale of beer would not be regretted by me, although I am just now opening the canteen at the post and selling beer in the evenings under restrictions. As to whether more harm than good is done thereby is problematical.

I have observed the workings of the canteen feature of the exchange system during about seven years' service at posts of Forts Assinniboine, Grant, San Carlos, Sill, Washakie; and camps at Lakeland, Fla., and Chickamauga, Ga. While fully realizing the fact that the canteen tends to reduce drunkenness in this, that a drinking place is established in the garrison under restrictions which certainly lessen the desire of men to go outside for stronger intoxicants, such as whisky, rum, etc., yet the fact remains that when the War Department goes into the saloon business it can not but detract, in the mind of the soldier, from those high conceptions of the functions of the Government which he should constantly have before him.

The recruit, upon arrival at his post and finding a beer saloon (canteen) in operation under the auspices of the Government, which he is told by the advocates of the canteen is established to improve the morals of the enlisted man, is certainly tempted to improve (?) his own morals by patronizing it; and yet if he but take a glass too much (and there are few men capable of accurately gauging their capacities in such matters), he is court-martialed for patronizing too liberally a Government institution. There seems something incongruous in all this, and years of experience at posts where canteens have been in operation have not served to eradicate the impression.

It may be said that all this is mere sentiment, but sentiment plays so important a part in human affairs, both in the Army and out of it, that it is not to be lightly disregarded. In my experience the most difficult thing in the management of the canteen is to enforce orders restricting men to proper limits in beer drinking. On May 23 I caused the canteen (which had been closed for about six weeks) to be opened, hoping in that way to prevent the introduction of whisky, which had been smuggled into the post. The canteen was ordered kept open from after supper until 9 p. m., and stringent orders given that no man should have more than one bottle of bottled beer or, in lieu thereof, three glasses of draft beer.

The first two evenings twice this quantity was sold, and men became drunk, though there was whisky in the post at the same time which assisted to cause the trouble mentioned in the accompanying press dispatch, which, though inaccurate, is unfortunately truthful in this respect—that the canteen was opened on the night in question and several men evidently secured there more beer than my instructions authorized, and became drunk.

[Press dispatch referred to.]

TRIED TO KILL HIS CAPTAIN—SOLDIER AT FORT WASHAKIE CRAZED WITH LIQUOR—FILLED UP ON CANTEEN BEER AND THEN SOUGHT TO AVENGE HIMSELF FOR SOME IMAGINARY WRONG.

"LANDERS, WYO., May 24.

"Last evening James E. Workman, a private belonging to Troop E, First Cavalry, stationed at Fort Washakie, made an attempt to kill his commanding officer, Captain Brown. The post canteen, which had been closed for a time, was opened yesterday, and Workman filled himself up on beer, and for some imaginary grievance made the attack. He was discovered by the guard and disarmed and put in the guardhouse. He has been suffering today from an attack of the delirium tremens."

Capt. Clarence Deems, commanding Battery C: Highly beneficial to the health and discipline of the Army. Am in favor of such prohibition.

Capt. George E. Sage, commanding Battery E: Benefit the moral tone of the men and improve the discipline of the service. I am in favor of such prohibition.

Capt. J. A. Lundeen, commanding Battery A: I think the ultimate effect would be beneficial to the service. It would be very difficult to prevent men that crave stimulants from obtaining them. I am in favor of prohibition where it really prohibits the men from getting intoxicants.

It would result in much improvement in the tone of the Army. The authorizing of the sale of an intoxicant by the Army is looked upon as a licensing of this evil by enlisted men. The absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicants within 1 or 2 miles of a post or camp would, in my opinion, result in much benefit to the service, along with strict regulations against inebriety. Less encouragement to post exchanges and more to post libraries would, in my opinion, tend to increase the moral tone and afford a means of counter attraction.

Capt. James T. Kerr, commanding Company K: "Much discontent on account of loss to revenue of messes. Prohibition, if provision is made for replacing the revenue lost thereby to messes, say 1½ cents per man per day. It is not the use of beer, but its abuse, that is objectionable. I have never yet seen a canteen that a self-respecting soldier could find pleasure in entering for a few days after pay day, as there are always men who drink more than is good for them. In the rush and jam of pay day it is impracticable to single out these and prevent them from getting more, and the only way to regulate in such case is to close the canteen, whose raison d'etre is that the use of beer may be really regulated."

The natural tendency of the canteen is to encourage the drinking of beer, especially since the profits go to the improvement of the mess, and in these days of short enlistments, comparatively few reenlistments, and generally young recruits the disadvantages of the canteen seem to me to outweigh the advantages. A sort of local option in the matter, leaving it to the regimental commander to decide, he being responsible for the discipline of his command, would perhaps be better than prohibition. If Congress does put on a prohibition, it should at least provide a fund of 1½ cents per man per day in cash for improvement of mess.

I firmly believe, although not classing myself a total abstainer, and admitting that I indulge occasionally in a glass of beer, but never in liquor, that the absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army would be a benefit to the soldiers and would improve the efficiency of the Army, both from a standpoint of morality and discipline.

Capt. W. H. W. James, commanding Company C: In my opinion the effect of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army would be a wonderful benefit and advantage to the Army. I am most emphatically in favor of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army. I have commanded a company where an exchange was in operation for about three years. In my opinion the way for a man to keep from drinking immoderately is for him not to drink intoxicating liquors at all. By not drinking intoxicating liquors at all a man does not cultivate a taste and liking for intoxicating liquors.

If a man drinks at all, he is, in my opinion, liable to form a taste and liking for it, the taste and liking for which may be the cause of his ruin. In my opinion, very often the moderate drinker becomes a drunkard. I have seen a statement in print to the following effect, that Sir Garnet Wolseley, the commander in chief of the British army, stated that two young officers of the army starting out, supposing them to be equal in all respects except that one was a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor and the other was a moderate drinker, that the total abstainer had a great advantage over the other officer, a moderate drinker of intoxicating liquors.

I believe his statement is true, and I believe that the same will apply to two soldiers, supposing them to be equal in all respects except that one is a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating drinks and the other a moderate drinker of intoxicating liquor. I believe that the one who is a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor has a wonderful advantage over the one who is a moderate drinker. I believe the argument in favor of the sale of beer in the exchange is that it is the lesser of two evils—that is, that if not sold in the exchange more intoxicating and worse intoxicating liquor would be obtained outside of the post or camp.

I say, why take either evil? I am myself a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor except when necessary as a medicine, which is exceedingly seldom. I believe it is wonderfully better for me to be a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor except when necessary as a medicine, and I believe it would be wonderfully better for the enlisted man to be a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor. I believe the sale of beer in the exchange, under official sanction, is likely to produce the impression in the mind of the soldier that as it is sold with official sanction that it is not so bad, after all, to drink beer.

In my opinion the effect would be good.

FORT MOTT, N. J., June 17, 1899.

Mr. President, there is other testimony which it seems to me belongs to this debate. Here is an article from the Denver Evening Post on the work of the canteen. It refers to an officer of the Army whose unfortunate fate caused many a pang among his friends. The article is as follows:

[Denver Evening Post, September 15, 1899.]

The suicide of poor Harry McDowell, of Company M, took place last December. Repeated attempts have been made to conceal the real facts. A stigma was put upon the memory of this man to which he was not entitled. McDowell had been out of the hospital only two days. He was homesick. He got drunk on liquor bought in the regimental saloon on credit, and had not the canteen records been burned they would prove it. He was thrown into the guardhouse. This consisted of two rooms aggregating 16 by 32 feet in size, with a low ceiling, and situated on the ground floor, a part of a Manila house that no Filipino will sleep in because of the deadly fever.

This guardhouse had one small window and one door, which was kept closed by McCoy's (McCoy was colonel of the regiment) express orders. The thermometer was then nearly 100° in the shade every day, and the days and nights were rendered terrible by the odors and mosquitoes in the prison. There were 23 men there the day McDowell died. He had passed a sleepless night; he was in the condition any man just from the hospital and sick from intoxication would be in, and he reported to Major Kemble for relief. Because McDowell took no bottle to the dispensary he got no medicine. He returned to the guardhouse. The door still being shut, he tried to get relief by using a small fan. About noon he remarked: "I can't stand this any longer," and taking a knife cut his throat. After this the guardhouse door was kept open. There is blood on the canteen profits and its promoters.

Mr. President, I have here an article from a Habana newspaper, the Habana Post, dated July 6, 1900.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from New Hampshire advises me that he read it and had it inserted in his remarks this morning. Therefore I shall not read it. I shall ask, however, that it may be inserted in what I have said on this subject.

[From the Habana Post, July 6, 1900.]

A DISGRACED OCCASION.

It was a source of genuine disappointment to the large assemblage of American citizens who gathered to witness the Vedado field sports of the soldiers belonging to the batteries stationed there that a feature not down on the programme, but made one of the most notable of the day, should have been brought prominently to their attention. The permitting of the Army canteen on the ground to the right and in front of the grand stand gave the visitors, American and Cuban, an enforced opportunity of witnessing the disgraceful spectacle of perhaps a hundred drunken soldiers, many of whom were violently disorderly, even to engaging in fist fights and general brawls in the presence and ostensibly under the supervision of the officers of the batteries.

It is doubtful if such a disgusting and disgraceful spectacle has ever before been offered the people of Cuba upon the occasion of a public celebration. Certainly not within the experience of a large proportion of the civilian visitors who went to the exercises expecting to see high-class sports conducted in an orderly and truly American manner has there ever been witnessed such scenes of drunkenness, disorderliness, and general confusion.

The Fourth of July was disgraced by the debauchery which prevailed, but it was even worse prostituted by officers who gave their consent to the establishing of a drinking tent in the place of public amusement, to which the public had been invited and whose money was taken for what was supposed to be a respectably conducted exercise. So noticeable was the debauchery for a time that some one in authority closed the place for at least two hours, giving the boys this much time in which to sober up, but it was reopened at 1 o'clock and from that hour until the exercises were over was the rendezvous for all the Army toughs the batteries and visiting companies contained, fight after fight following as men lost their heads under the influence of liquor, in the rays of a broiling tropical sun. It was a repulsive sight for the ladies, hundreds of whom were forced to view it from their grandstand seats, and equally disgusting to the sterner sex, who love their natal day and would have been glad to have seen it observed in decency and order.

Some one is to blame for the disgrace which was brought to the United States and its flag Wednesday. How can we consistently censure ill-tempered Spaniards and Cubans from displaying it upside down when we admit to our public places of amusement disorderly conducted canteens to turn our soldiers upside down, make them lose their self-control, and indulge in rowdyism that belonged to the Bowery of other days. The canteen did not locate itself in a conspicuous part of the grounds, nor did it license itself to sell liquor to soldiers in all stages of intoxication. If it was thought necessary for the pleasure of the boys in blue that they should have their beer upon such an occasion, the canteen should have at least been put under guard, and at the worst have been conducted decently.

Furthermore, it should have been located where visitors would not have been made to see its rowdyism and debauchery. Every self-respecting American must have felt like hiding his head in shame over the disgusting exhibition given him at the Vedado field sports on Wednesday. Small wonder is it that the Cuban ladies who were present, to whom such scenes are altogether unknown, should have shown the revulsion of feeling that many of them manifested, and small wonder is it that American ladies in the grand stand blushed with mortification at the indecencies of the day. The Fourth of July was sorely disgraced in our own house.

The purport of the article is that in some sort of a fiesta in Habana, only a few months ago, the canteen was established on the fair grounds, or wherever the celebration was being held, and it there became the principal object of attraction, much to the disgust of our Cuban friends, who criticised the liquor system of the United States in some respects almost unmercifully. If we are going abroad to civilize other people, it seems to me that we want to take there the best morals we have, and keep at home those institutions that are not proper. Therefore I am opposed to sending the institution of the saloon into the Philippines. I prefer to keep it at home, if it is to continue to survive.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that the article from the Habana Post is to the effect that the canteen system increased the consumption of intoxicating liquors in Cuba?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; the Senator did not understand me thoroughly. I said the purport of the article was that the canteen was established on the fair grounds, where the celebration was held, and many of the soldiers and private citizens came under the influence of liquor as a result of the canteen's presence there. I said nothing about the increased sale of liquor in Cuba.

Mr. BUTLER. The canteen sold only beer and light wines. Did the canteen sell whisky?

Mr. GALLINGER. They got gloriously drunk, according to the report.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think it is a notorious fact that people get drunk on beer. It is not necessary to drink whisky in order to become intoxicated.

Mr. BUTLER. The Cubans drink very freely of light wines. They do not drink whisky much. In the Philippines and in Cuba we taught them to drink whisky, but they did not drink it much before we went there. The canteen proposes to furnish the soldiers with about the kind of drinks that those simple natives indulged in, more or less harmlessly, before we went there, as I understand it. So I was a little curious to know just what effect the establishment of the canteen that sold only beer and light wines would have on a people who confined their drink almost exclusively to light wines before we carried civilization to them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I can speak only for myself when I say that I do not believe the introduction of liquor of any character, whether it be beer, whisky, or wine, into any community is conducive to civilization. That is my own personal opinion. I think it is an opinion entirely aside from party politics. It is held by a great many good Democrats and good Populists, and a very large number of good Republicans.

Mr. BUTLER. That statement is very sound.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. On this subject I wish to read briefly from the official record of the deaths in the Army and Navy from April 7, 1898, to February 20, 1899, during the war with Spain, because it furnishes an exposition of the methods of the War Department that can not be answered by investigating commissions or courts of inquiry. In that time in the Army there were killed in action 329 men; died of wounds, 125; died of diseases, 5,277. That was in the Army, when the canteen was in vogue and was encouraged, where light wines and beer and perhaps much stronger liquor were sold or dispensed freely. As to the Navy, here are the facts: In the same time there were killed in action in the Navy, 17; died of wounds, 1; died of diseases, 0. I will say that in the Navy the canteen has found no place, and if it ever did, it has been abolished. I wish to furnish the testimony of the present Secretary of the Navy as to that phase of the question. Secretary Long was accused by the press of having allowed his Department to be dictated to by outsiders, and in an interview in Boston, February 19, 1898, he said:

It is not true that any society outside the service caused the issuing of the order.

That was the order against the sale of beer or any other kind of liquor in the Navy.

It was done at the solicitation of naval officers themselves, who were actuated by a sense of duty to the service. The sale of beer on shipboard was regarded by many of them as an evil, and they sought to abate it. * * * The matter was first suggested to the Department by Captain Folger, of the cruiser New Orleans. After his return from the war he wrote a letter in which he fully explained the evils which, in his judgment, resulted from permitting the sale of liquor on shipboard.

This letter I referred to a number of other captains. Among them were Captains Barker, Higginson, Crowninshield, and Bradford. After a careful consideration of the matter they reported, the majority of them favoring the absolute prohibition of beer and liquor on board. Then it was that the order was issued. The Department felt that its duty to the boys and men in the service required such an order.

And there is no canteen in the Navy.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the protests against this proposed liquor legislation, the respectful protests that are made by hundreds of thousands of good people in this country, are deserving of some consideration, and that the dignified petitions of numerous temperance organizations should be heeded here and now.

We should not turn, it seems to me, a deaf ear to the prayerful supplications of the parents of the young men who are serving in the Army of the United States, especially to the mothers of those boys. Whatever we may think of the private individual who engages in the liquor business, who opens a saloon and sells these poisonous concoctions to his fellow-men, I think there can be but one mind as to whether it is morally right for the Government of the United States to engage in the saloon business.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that at the beginning of this the twentieth century the American Congress can honor itself and add new glory to our republican institutions by wiping out the official saloon. For these reasons I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be defeated.

AGREEMENT WITH THE CHEROKEES.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, there are two House bills on the table which I ask to have laid before the Senate in order that conferees may be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11820) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. THURSTON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and grant the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

AGREEMENT WITH CREEK INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11821) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Muscogee or Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. THURSTON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

GEORGE G. KEMP.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution, and as it will take but a moment to pass it, I ask for its immediate consideration. It is to recall a bill from the hands of the President that it is important to come back to the Senate.

The concurrent resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate No. 1226, granting an increase of pension to George G. Kemp.

THOMAS WHITE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as no Senator has taken the floor on the Army bill, I ask leave to report a House pension bill that an absent Senator is very desirous of having passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to receiving the report at this time? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10785) granting a pension to Thomas White, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Thomas White, late sergeant of Company F, Ninetieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and of the Signal Corps, United States Army, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE K. BOWEN.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4208) for the relief of George K. Bowen. There will be no opposition to it. I ask that it be read. There is an amendment reported by the committee.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to revoke the order dismissing George K. Bowen from the service as lieutenant-colonel, who was assigned to the command of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. (Said regiment was attached to the Eighteenth Army Corps.) Said applicant while in command of said regiment above cited and on the march to enter Richmond, Va., received an order from the War Department dismissing him from the service. Said officer was ignorant of charges having been preferred, and had no opportunity to refute said charges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to hear the committee amendment read. It may improve the bill somewhat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Military Affairs report to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay or allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I must object if it is proposed to pass the bill in its present form, reciting certain history, making facts that occurred in the country the law of the land.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SEWELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] reported the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The bill can be amended.

Mr. SEWELL. The report was made by me, and I thoroughly investigated the matter. The bill is a very meritorious measure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bill ought to be changed in its form.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it lie over.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to its consideration if the narrative part of the bill is stricken out.

Mr. SPOONER. Why was the officer dismissed?

Mr. SEWELL. He was dismissed by reason of the fact that his command, which contained a lot of new troops which had been assigned to the regiment, got loose at Norfolk and there was some drunkenness among them. The officer was not to blame for it. I investigated the case thoroughly and I have submitted the report, which is here. I think anyone who will read the report will be satisfied that the bill is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems that he was dismissed because somebody else got drunk.

Mr. HOAR. I make no objection to the bill. I merely want to have the narrative part of it stricken out.

Mr. DANIEL. Let the report be read.

Mr. PENROSE. I move to strike out the narrative part of the bill, and I ask for a vote on it as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to know whether the Senate consents to the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the bill be withdrawn for the present, so that there may be leisure to make the necessary amendment. It can be called up again.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Iowa mean that it can be called up this afternoon?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall have no objection to calling it up at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. ALLISON. I infer from the situation of the Army bill that the Senate is not prepared to go on with it any further this evening, and I ask unanimous consent to call up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, so that the Senate may make some progress with the bill this evening. There will be no controverted questions raised during the evening.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator kindly permit me to finish what I began this morning?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to reconsider the vote by which a resolution for printing 3,000 copies of the committee hearing on the Army bill was passed, because another resolution, which provides for printing 15,000 copies, is pending and has gone to the Committee on Printing. I should therefore like to recall the resolution which proposes to print 3,000 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the resolution offered by him this morning to print 3,000 copies of the report of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I was out of the Chamber for a few moments. I do not know what has been done since I left. I wish to secure a vote on the canteen matter.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood that the Senator from Connecticut did not propose to go on any further with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me, I should like to have a vote on that question. The most important thing before the country to-day is this Army bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have unanimous consent that the Senate shall vote on the canteen question to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that, as far as I am concerned, I do not intend to delay a vote on the canteen question or anything else connected with the bill, but I object to putting it down for to-morrow at a fixed hour.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that he must certainly recognize the necessity of passing the Army bill immediately, and we can not do it if we are going to spend our time on side issues like the canteen question. Can you not agree to a time when we shall take a vote on the canteen amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I know that several Senators want to say something on the canteen question, and a good many of them are away. The attendance in the Senate is rather light just now. There has not been any disposition here to delay the bill at all.

Mr. SEWELL. That would indefinitely postpone the consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. TELLER. What would?

Mr. SEWELL. To postpone a vote on the canteen amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I do not ask you to postpone the canteen amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not ask for a vote on the bill. I ask for a vote on the canteen amendment to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. I have stated to the Senator that I object to that. The Senator has no right to infer that because I object to it I want any delay on this bill. I think it is an infamous bill, but I expect that it will pass. I have no objection to its being voted on. I object to its passage, but I do not object to its being voted on.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator not agree to fix a time for a vote——

Mr. TELLER. I realize that if the bill is to be passed it ought to be passed at an early date. I agree to that.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator not agree to fix a time for a vote on the canteen amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I have not any right to do that. I want to make some remarks on the subject, and I know some other Senators do. I will agree, so far as my remarks are concerned, that they shall be brief, and they are not intended for delay; but at this hour I am not willing that an agreement shall be made.

GEORGE K. BOWEN.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have stricken out the narrative part of the bill (S. 4208) for the relief of George K. Bowen, and I ask the Senate to consider it and put it on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator moves to amend it.

Mr. SPOONER. When the bill was presented to the Senate the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] objected. He is not present now. I do not know what the ground of his objection was, or whether it is eliminated by the amendment or not. I think, perhaps, the Senator ought not to call it up in his absence under the circumstances.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood that the Senator's objection was to the narration of facts in the body of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what objection the Senator from Connecticut had to it. He made the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was not I who made any objection. The bill has been before the Military Committee and has been reported favorably.

Mr. SEWELL. It has been reported favorably. I myself made the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I recollect it. I know the committee very cheerfully voted for it.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill be read as I have proposed to amend it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to it. I merely made the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in the form it will be providing the amendment which is now offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is agreed to by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order dismissing George K. Bowen from the service as lieutenant-colonel, who was assigned to the command of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry: Provided, That no pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out after the word "Infantry," in line 7, the words:

Said regiment was attached to the Eighteenth Army Corps. Said applicant, while in command of said regiment above cited and on the march to enter Richmond, Va., received an order from the War Department dismissing him from the service. Said officer was ignorant of charges having been preferred, and had no opportunity to refute said charges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. There is another amendment, a committee amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. The last provision is in twice, is it not?

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that as it now reads it does not do what he desires to accomplish. What the Senator wants to do, evidently, is to authorize the President of the United States to revoke and set aside the special order dismissing this officer and then to issue to him an honorable discharge, neither of which is done in the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. I think the bill in its present form will cover the whole thing. This officer was discharged summarily by the Secretary of War.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; by the President. Your own report shows it.

Mr. SEWELL. It was done by the Secretary of War, practically, on a report from Fortress Monroe in relation to the action of a certain body of troops under Colonel Bowen's command.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was Special Order 147.

Mr. SEWELL. He was discharged without a hearing by a court-martial. All he desires is to be reinstated in his position honorably, in the sense that he is not to be dismissed. He asks for nothing. The bill provides that he shall get nothing. Therefore I see no objection to it.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. SEWELL June 1, 1900; which is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4206) for the relief of George K. Bowen, beg to submit the following statement from the Record and Pension Office of the War Department, followed by this officer's personal statement as to the matter stated in the bill:

Case of George K. Bowen, late lieutenant-colonel One hundred and eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

It is shown by the records that George K. Bowen was enrolled April 18, 1861, as a private in Company F, First Regiment Pennsylvania Artillery Volunteers (the designation of which was changed to Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers), to serve three months, and that he was mustered out with the company as a private August 3, 1861.

He was again mustered into service for the term of three years November 13, 1862, at Philadelphia, as captain of a company in Roberts's Independent Battalion Pennsylvania Volunteers, the designation of which became in November or December, 1862, Company C, Independent Battalion Pennsylvania Artillery, and in March or April, 1863, Company C, Third Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery. This regiment appears to have been organized for garrison duty at Fort Monroe, Va. There, early in 1864, he took part in the organization of a new regiment, the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Infantry, composed principally of surplus recruits for the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, and was mustered in as lieutenant-colonel One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania, to date April 1, 1864.

From April 1, 1864, to March 27, 1865, he was the senior officer of the regiment, and for most of the time in command of it, during which period it served in the Army of the James in the operations along the James River and before Petersburg, first in the Eighteenth Corps, and later, upon the reorganization of the Army of the James, as a part of the Third Brigade, commanded by Col. S. H. Roberts, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Corps.

In August, 1864, he was sent to hospital at Fort Monroe, where a leave of absence for twenty days was granted him about September 18, with permission to visit his home at Germantown, Pa. By reason of his having overstayed this leave, on account of prolonged illness, an order was issued from the War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, November 2, 1864, honorably discharging him on account of physical disability. Meantime he had reported for duty on October 31, and on his application, supported by the recommendation of his superior officers, another order was issued from the Adjutant-General's Office on November 12, 1864, revoking the order discharging him, whereupon he resumed command of his regiment.

A military commission, appointed November 5, 1864, to examine into the cause and authority of his prolonged absence, reported on the 11th of that month that a sufficient cause existed for his absence from his regiment for a longer period than was granted in his original leave of absence.

He was arraigned and tried before a general court-martial of which Brig. Gen. George H. Gordon was president, convened at Fort Monroe, Va., in December, 1864, on the charge of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and absence without leave, and found "not guilty" on each of the charges and specifications and acquitted and restored to duty.

About March 5, 1865, Col. S. H. Roberts, commanding the Third Brigade, under special instructions from General Grant, set out from Fort Harrison, Va., with a picked force, including the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania, under Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen, on an expedition up the Rappahannock River to Fredericksburg, Va., via Fort Monroe, for the purpose of breaking up illicit trade, principally in tobacco, and destroying the Fredericksburg Railroad. The force returned from the expedition to Fort Monroe on the evening of March 8, with a large quantity of tobacco and other articles contraband of war. From Fort Monroe it appears the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania, under Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen, was, on the afternoon of March 9, 1865, sent over to Portsmouth on the steam transport Matilda for the purpose of coaling, where, the regiment having disembarked, a disturbance occurred, in which its members took part, and which resulted in Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen's dismissal from service, the circumstances of which will appear from the following correspondence:

HEADQUARTERS NORFOLK, PORTSMOUTH, AND DEFENSES,
Portsmouth, Va., March 12, 1865.

MAJOR: I herewith submit reports of the conduct of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers. In addition, I would state that at 1 p. m. I left for Suffolk and returned to Portsmouth at 9.15 p. m. On my arrival I found the city virtually in the hands of an armed mob. On sending for the commanding officer of the One hundred and eighty-eighth he could not be found, and my aid reported that there was only one officer with the troops. I directed immediately after the concentration of all disposable forces in order to put down the riot, which, in my opinion, might soon be converted into a mutiny. The arrival of these troops was not reported to me.

No permission was given them to land. They were allowed to wander about the streets, with arms—were drunk and endangering the safety of the town, and all Government supplies stored here. When the colonel did at length repair to my quarters, I perceived that he had been drinking to intoxication. As far as I can learn, but little or no effort was made to preserve order or discipline. The crew of the vessel was permitted to leave her, so that when she was required to be brought to the dock to embark the troops she could not be moved.

The statement of James Wingate shows that, so far from the officers endeavoring to control their men, one of them took forcible possession of private property, liquor, and served it out to his men.

Colonel Bowen was not only intoxicated, but was evidently grossly ignorant of his duty. He did not appear to be aware that it was his duty to report his arrival at headquarters. He thought that the order of the quartermaster at Fort Monroe, or the master of the vessel, was all that was necessary for his being brought into dock and the troops landed. The master of the vessel permitted his crew to leave the vessel without authority. I think that an example should be made of Colonel Bowen and the master of the vessel for their gross neglect of duty.

I was given to understand that the troops constituted a part of an expedition on foot. I did not detain the vessel long enough to thoroughly investigate the case so far as to report the names of the officers drunk. I learned from Colonel Bowen that the man creating the principal riot is Sergeant Beatty. All of his comrades that came under my own inspection did not manifest the least disposition to stop him, but, on the contrary, gave tokens of their willingness to aid and abet him.

I am, Major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. VOGDES, Brigadier-General.

Maj. WICKHAM HOFFMAN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

(The recommendation of General Vogdes is based in part on the reports of several of the subordinate officers on duty at Portsmouth and the statement of one James Wingate, a citizen of that place.)

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF EASTERN VIRGINIA,
Norfolk, Va., March 14, 1865.

COLONEL: I have the honor to forward the inclosed reports for the consideration of the commanding general.

I have the honor to recommend that Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen, commanding the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, be summarily dismissed the service for intoxication, gross ignorance of his duty, and allowing a total want of discipline to exist in his regiment.

I would also recommend that a board of inquiry be ordered to investigate and report the names of the officers who neglected their duty and to inquire into and report the facts, with reference especially to the two who, according to the testimony of Wingate, were fighting with each other.

This board should also report upon the conduct of that officer who refused to arrest any but his own men, of all who were prominent in the mutiny, or who neglected their manifest duty to put it down.

I am, Colonel, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. H. GORDON,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Lieut. Col. ED. W. SMITH,
Acting Adjutant-General, Department of Virginia.

[Indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA,
March 18, 1865.

This officer has been before a court-martial on a former occasion for similar offenses and escaped only through a belief that there was a disposition to give him credit for nothing, so it is privately stated by the president of the court. I recommend that he be dismissed the service, or if so authorized will dismiss him and forward the order for approval.

E. O. C. ORD,
Major-General, Commanding.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY.

The recommendation of General Ord was approved, and Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen dismissed in Special Orders, No. 147, paragraph 57, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 27, 1865, the text of which is as follows:

"By direction of the President, Lieut. Col. George K. Bowen, One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, is hereby dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States for intoxication, gross ignorance of his duties, and allowing a total want of discipline to exist in his regiment."

Upon the return of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania from Fort Monroe after the disturbance at Portsmouth it took part, under Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen's command, in several other expeditions from that point, and about the 25th of March returned to its former camp at Harrison, Va., from whence, on April 3, 1865, about the time the officer received notice of his dismissal, it moved to occupy Richmond, being at the time a part of the Third Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Corps.

Immediately upon receipt by Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen of the discharge order a petition, signed by the major and 12 other officers of the regiment, was, on April 3, 1865, prepared and forwarded to the War Department, urging his reinstatement, the text of the petition being as follows:

"We, the undersigned commissioned officers of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, having learned with regret that Lieut. Col. George K. Bowen, of this regiment, has been dishonorably discharged the United States service, do respectfully request that the sentence of dismissal be changed so as to accept his resignation.

"In our opinion the much to be regretted proceedings at Portsmouth were not attributable to any delinquency on the part of Colonel Bowen, nor do we consider that he was at all intoxicated or disqualified for performing his duties.

"Colonel Bowen has been with us through all the campaign of last summer, and in several engagements has shown both his courage and efficiency, and after a faithful service of now nearly three years is well entitled to an honorable discharge."

On April 5 the following petition, signed by the respective commanders of the Fifty-eighth Pennsylvania, Second New Hampshire, Twenty-first Connecticut, Fortieth Massachusetts, and One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania, was also forwarded:

"We, the undersigned, the field officers of regiments composing the Third Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Army Corps, have heard with regret the severe sentence pronounced on Lieut. Col. George K. Bowen, of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and are of the opinion that an investigation of his conduct would have led to more lenient treatment, since from our previous knowledge of this officer we can testify to his good conduct in action as well as in the ordinary routine of camp duty. The charge of intoxication we conceive to have been made under an imperfect knowledge of all circumstances of the case.

"The discipline maintained by Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen has been good, and the disturbance on which the allegation of want of discipline was founded was a temporary matter, occasioned mostly by 300 men, unassigned recruits of the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, unwillingly assigned to the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Infantry for duty. We have no doubt Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen used all the means at his disposal to suppress anything like insubordination.

"We think Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen's knowledge of his duties fully equal to that of many more fortunate officers now in the service, and we therefore most respectfully ask that his resignation may be accepted, or that if he be considered unworthy of his position as an officer a proper investigation of his conduct may be had."

Under date of May 2, 1865, Mr. Bowen addressed General Ord a lengthy statement in explanation and extenuation of the affair at Portsmouth, which statement was forwarded to the War Department, with a copy of the order of discharge, indorsed as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT,
Richmond, Va., May 9, 1865.

Respectfully forwarded for the consideration of the Secretary of War.

When this order was issued there was necessity for several prompt dismissals and changes, and Colonel Bowen's case came up indorsed by General Gordon and reported by General Vogdes as one calling for the immediate and summary action which it received. I had my doubts as to the propriety of acting on General Vogdes's report, but think the dismissal had a good effect on the command, even if it were not deserved. Colonel Bowen's report is in good taste—bears the evidence of an officer who had a good reputation—and now that the service can afford to be kind and considerate, which it could not then, to officers negligent or unsuccessful, I recommend that this order be rescinded, and, if the vacancy has been filled, Colonel Bowen be allowed to resign.

E. O. C. ORD,
Major-General, Commanding.

On May 24, 1865, the late officer applied to the Secretary of War for reinstatement in a letter, the text of which is as follows:

"I beg respectfully to lay before you the following facts which led to charges against me and the sentence of a dishonorable dismissal from the military service of the United States, promulgated in Special Orders, No. 147, paragraph 57, March 27, 1865, Adjutant-General's Office.

"On the 9th of March, after returning from an expedition to Fredericksburg, Va., in which the brigade to which my regiment was attached had been engaged, I was ordered by Brig. Gen. S. H. Roberts, commanding the expedition, to proceed to Portsmouth to obtain coal for the transport on which we were embarked, and also to cook rations.

"I was not aware that the headquarters of the brigadier-general commanding were at Portsmouth, so did not report immediately on arrival, and the captain of the transport being in haste to coal, which could not conveniently be done with the troops on board, I landed them in a large inclosed coal yard, taking all the precautions I deemed requisite to retain them there, and provided fuel from the Quartermaster's Department for cooking, in accordance with the orders received from Brevet Brigadier-General Roberts, against which I had received no contrary orders whatever.

"During a short absence to the provost-marshal's office, rendered necessary by a slight disturbance which had previously occurred, a large quatity of liquor was smuggled into the yard by inhabitants of the town in exchange for tobacco, of which the men had a large supply, captured and distributed to them at Fredericksburg.

"About 35 or 40 men became intoxicated and, eluding the guards, escaped into the town and produced the disorder charged.

"I had in my regiment 500 unassigned recruits of the Third Pennsylvania Artillery, whose discontent and insubordination had been frequently reported to your office.

"These were the men who on this occasion created all the disturbance.

"Both the men and officers of my old regiment assisted by all means in their power to preserve order, as, indeed, did many of the recruits, but one exception to the contrary occurring. Captain Jackson, of Company E of the regiment, became intoxicated and attempted to interfere with the guards posted, on which he was immediatedly arrested and removed under guard to the boat, and on our return to camp, on a renewal of misconduct, was recommended for dismissal, which was lately carried into effect.

"I was not under the influence of liquor, nor have I ever been addicted to intemperance, as is certified by the inclosed letter. I would also refer for my general good conduct and the discipline of my regiment to Brig. Gen. Charles Devins, commanding Third Division, Twenty-fourth Army Corps, and to Bvt. Brig. Gen. S. H. Roberts, commanding Third Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Army Corps; also to the inclosed petitions of my former comrades.

"Upon the first call for troops by our late lamented President, I served in the ninety-days volunteers, with two of my brothers, one of which, subsequently a lieutenant of the Seventy-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, fell mortally wounded in the second battle of Bull Run. The other is now major of the One hundred and fourteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

"In October of 1862 I was appointed a captain in the Roberts Independent Battalion of Heavy Artillery, afterwards the Third Artillery, and through my personal influence and exertions raised the only full battery of 147 men that left the State for that organization. In March, 1864, I obtained leave to raise a regiment of infantry from the surplus men of the Third Pennsylvania Artillery.

"Entirely by my own influence and character as an officer I led out from Fort Monroe nearly 900 men, most of whom were old members of the Third Artillery and comfortably located on garrison duty.

"With that regiment, in the same brigade and division, I have served through the entire campaign, now so successfully ended, and participated in every action, excepting only Fort Harrison, from which I was absent, ill of disease contracted in the pits before Petersburg.

"In view of these facts I pray that the sentence of dishonorable dismissal, together with the charge of intoxication, remaining as a blot and stigma upon my character, may be removed and an honorable discharge granted to me."

This application and the other papers in the case were referred to the Bureau of Military Justice for review and recommendation, and that Bureau reported adversely under date of June 7, 1865, concluding as follows:

"The conclusion is arrived at in this case that no sufficient grounds have as yet been shown for revoking the action heretofore taken by the War Department upon the positive and convincing testimony of General Vogdes and other officers.

"If Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen deems himself to have been, in the language of the act of March 3, 1865,' wrongfully and unjustly dismissed,' it is open to him, upon presenting his affidavit to that effect, to obtain a trial by court-martial on the charges upon which his dismissal was founded.

"In view of the character of the witnesses and of their testimony, it is believed that this case is not one in which the clemency of the pardoning power can properly—especially at this early date—be invoked, and the opinion is therefore entertained that he should be remitted to his statute remedy as the only one which may suitably be pursued by him under the circumstances."

Thereupon, by direction of the Secretary of War, Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen was informed by letter, dated June 12, 1865, that no sufficient grounds were perceived to warrant interference in his behalf.

Respectfully submitted.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, May 2, 1900.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Statement of George K. Bowen, late lieutenant-colonel, commanding One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

I entered the service of the United States Volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, in April, 1861, as a private, enlisting in Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Infantry, and served during the three months' campaign, at the end of which I was honorably discharged.

During the year 1862 I accepted a commission as captain in the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, and recruited two batteries for that regiment, and was mustered in as captain of Company C and stationed at Fort Monroe.

The Third Pennsylvania Artillery overrecruited, and, at Gen. B. F. Butler's request, I took command of this surplus (on their volunteering for active service) as lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers. A colonel was commissoned by Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania. Before the colonel could join the regiment we were reduced in action at Drewrys Bluff and Cold Harbor below the number required to muster a colonel.

Soon after the battle of Cold Harbor I received a commission as colonel of the One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, unsolicited by me. I was not mustered in on that commission for want of sufficient number of men.

During the campaign in front of Petersburg my regiment was further reduced to 300 enlisted men, with hardly officers to command them. I also received another draft of 700 overplus recruits from the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, who were sent to me from Fort Monroe without their consent having been obtained. I also received orders to carry them as unassigned recruits. These men were dissatisfied and restless, both at being forced into active service and at being carried as unassigned recruits.

Upon returning from Whitehouse with General Sheridan's command, my regiment was placed on a transport and ordered to Portsmouth, Va., to coal as rapidly as possible and follow the rest of the brigade up the James River. The men had plenty of money, and the 700 unassigned recruits, while in a Government inclosure at Portsmouth, unloaded to allow the coaling of the vessel.

During my temporary absence by order of general commanding at Portsmouth they obtained liquor, got drunk, and raised a row. My 300 men of the One hundred and eighty-eighth remained firm, and with their aid order was soon restored, the men reloaded on the transport, and we proceeded up the James River.

Shortly after, while riding at the head of my regiment entering Richmond, I was handed an order of the War Department dishonorably dismissing me from the service for "gross intoxication, total ignorance of duties, and total absence of discipline in regiment."

No trial by court-martial was had and no opportunity given to defend myself or explain the circumstances of the trouble. I was crushed and utterly disheartened, and at once left the Army.

I received an intimation that the total ignorance of duty was in not haivng applied for permission to remove my men to the shore at Portsmouth. I had supposed this to have been arranged with my orders to proceed to Portsmouth to coal. My orders were rush orders; 1,000 men crowded the transport, and the captain of the vessel declared he could not coal with the men on board.

I was not intoxicated then, nor at any other time during my service in the Army.

The facts as stated in the above documents appeal strongly to the sense of justice which, in military as well as civil law, should temper the enforcement of discipline or punishment to its true and proper end. Hasty legal decisions based on evidence which the accused is not allowed to hear, or summary dismissals without even an opportunity given to the accused to defend himself (which privilege is as old as human government) can only be justified during military operations by the commission of an offense, so heinous in character as to demand immediate conviction, without trial, for the best interests of the service. That such a case is here presented is extremely doubtful. This officer, with a regiment consisting of 300 members and 700 recruits whose assignment to it was very unsatisfactory to them, is placed on a transport ordered to Portsmouth, Va., to coal; on the arrival there of the transport it was found necessary to unload these men, as, otherwise, coal could not have been put in this vessel.

The unloading of these men this officer understood to be a part of the orders he had already received, but his doing so is construed as a total ignorance of duty, because he failed to apply for permission to the brigade commander, whose headquarters were at Portsmouth and of which he was unaware. These men were placed in a Government inclosure at this point and the requisite precautions taken to keep them in order. During this officer's absence liquor was smuggled to them by the citizens of the place, and a number of the men, becoming intoxicated, eluded the guard and created a disturbance, which was suppressed by the old members of the regiment, which is evidently true, as the men were soon reloaded on the transport and proceeded up the James River. It is difficult to see where a total want of discipline occurs, which is another of the charges on which this officer was dismissed. The remaining charge, that of intoxication, is denied.

So highly was this officer esteemed by his comrades that a petition was forwarded by the officers of his regiment for the revocation of the order of dismissal; also a petition of a similar character from the field officers of his brigade. Attention is specially called to the indorsement of Major-General Ord, forwarding these petitions, that he had doubts as to the propriety of acting on General Vodges's report, etc.

It is respectfully submitted that while there may have been ground for censure or even the punishment of this officer for his conduct on this occasion, the facts as presented did not warrant a summary dismissal, but that he should have been granted a trial by court-martial, in order that he might defend himself; that the failure to do this constituted a great injustice, which, taken into consideration with his long and faithful service and good character, as sustained by the indorsement of his comrades in the field, in the opinion of your committee justifies the passage of this bill, which is respectfully recommended with the following amendment:

"That no pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act."

During the reading of the report,

Mr. SEWELL. The report is quite long, and I should like to have read now the summary of the committee. I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has an amendment to offer to the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. SEWELL. Very well; let it be printed in the RECORD without further reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the further reading of the report will be dispensed with.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send to the desk, which will make the bill conform to all the precedents which have been followed by the Committee on Military Affairs for many years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the President be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to revoke and set aside Special Orders, No. 147, paragraph 57, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 27, 1865, dismissing George K. Bowen, lieutenant-colonel One hundred and eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and to cause to be issued to him an honorable discharge as of date March 27, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, pay, or allowance shall accrue by virtue hereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I had intended to ask the Senate to consider for a brief time the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, but so much time has been occupied by this other matter that I will not do so this afternoon. I wish to give notice, however, that at every opportunity possible I shall ask the Senate to consider that bill, interfering at no time with the consideration of the Army bill, when it is ready for consideration. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 9, 1901, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1901.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HENRY O. MORSE.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to the bill (H. R. 163) for the relief of Henry O. Morse.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CUMMINGS, indefinitely, on account of a broken leg.

EIGHTH DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read the following communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1901.

SIR: A question has arisen in regard to the payment of Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, member from the Eighth district of Alabama, who was elected on August 6, 1900, to succeed Hon. Joseph Wheeler. As I am informed, Mr. Wheeler has notified you, under date of August 17, 1900, that he resigned, the resignation to take effect August 6, 1900, while the governor of Alabama has certified to you that the resignation of Mr. Wheeler, bearing date April 20, 1900, was received on April 23 at the executive department of Alabama, and unconditionally accepted on that date. Mr. Wheeler has not demanded or received pay since March 4, 1899, the date of the beginning of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The question which arises is as to the date at which the compensation of Mr. RICHARDSON should begin.

In view of the somewhat complicated legal question involved, I should like to have further advice before making the payment.

Respectfully,

HENRY CASSON,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that inasmuch as this involves, as the Chair thinks, an entirely new question, for which no precedent can be found, and a large sum of money is involved, the Chair, without objection, will refer this communication to the Committee on the Judiciary, with authority on the part of that committee to report back at any time on the facts and the law. The Chair hears no objection, and this reference will be made.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 12740.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw the demand for a moment, and yield to the gentleman from New York.

HOUSE BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to move on the bills H. R. 11280 and 11281, which are on the Speaker's table, with Senate amendments, that the Senate amendments be nonconcurred in and that a conference be asked.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from New York is in respect to bills which the Clerk will report by their titles.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11820) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

A bill (H. R. 11821) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Muscogee or Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on nonconcurrence in the Senate amendments to both bills.

The Senate amendments were nonconcurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House on each bill: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. LITTLE.

REAPPORTIONMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the regular order, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12740) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Twelfth Census.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] one hour.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States provides that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. In order to arrive at the constitutional population, a further provision is made that at the end of each decennial period a census shall be taken of the inhabitants. Given such a census, the first question is, How shall the apportionment be made; in accordance with what rule?

It seems that from the inception of the Government down to 1840 the method of proceeding was to start with an arbitrary ratio, to divide this ratio into the constitutional population, and obtain as a result the number of Representatives to be apportioned among the various States. Since 1840, however, a period of sixty years, another method has been pursued; and that is to assume, arbitrarily in the first place, a number of Representatives; to divide this number of Representatives into the constitutional population, and obtain as a result a given ratio, which, applied to the various States in their turn, will give the number of Representatives to which, respectively, they are entitled.

There are pending before this House now two bills, each of which, it is claimed, has been drawn in accordance with this second method; that is to say, by the selection in the first place of an arbitrary number of Representatives, a division of that number into the constitutional population, obtaining a ratio for the distribution of Representatives in accordance therewith throughout the various States. The first bill, the bill of the majority, started with 357 Representatives, and, taking the figures reported by the Director of the Census, made a report apportioning the Representatives in the various States, recognizing in that apportionment certain fractions and disregarding others.

That is to say, it was found in this case, as it has been found in other cases, that the ratio assumed will not divide evenly into the constitutional population; that necessarily there will be fractions; and it was determined sixty years ago that the proper method of disposing of those fractions was to give to each majority fraction a Representative. That rule the majority bill follows until it arrives at 357 Representatives, and it then ceases to recognize this majority fraction. That leaves a majority fraction in the case of Florida, of Colorado, and of North Dakota.

In my judgment the majority bill would be as near a perfect bill as could be framed if there were added to it 3 more Representatives, making 360 in all, and apportioning those 3 Representatives, 1 each, to Florida, North Dakota, and Colorado. The minority bill, on the other hand, starts with 384 Representatives, and, taking the tables returned by the Director of the Census, it finds that after 384 are provided for there will be two majority fractions, one representing Nebraska and the other representing Virginia. The minority bill, therefore, adds to 384, with which it originally started, these 2, making 386 in all.

Now, it will be perfectly apparent to anyone who undertakes to examine the figures, that upon either basis exact justice has not been done and can not be done to all the States in their relation to each other. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] who addressed the House on Saturday last, put into the RECORD a table, of which I avail myself. It is on page 659 of the RECORD, and shows the difference between the lowest ratio of apportionment and the highest ratio of apportionment in the majority bill, and the lowest ratio of apportionment and the highest ratio in the minority bill. It will be observed that in the one case there is a difference of 34,000 and in the other a difference of over 97,000. But not content with that analysis, for my own satisfaction I undertook to make an analysis of the figures of the majority bill. That bill gives to Maine 4 Representatives, and I refer to Maine, not because I have any antipathy to Maine or to any citizen of Maine, but simply because her case furnishes the best basis upon which to make an analysis of this bill.

Upon the population of Maine, giving her 4 Representatives, the ratio appears to be 173,616. That is to say, for every 173,616 of her inhabitants a member of Congress is given. If, now, this Maine ratio be applied to the various States in their turn, it will be found that the following States have been fairly dealt with: Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, and Wisconsin; in all, with Maine, 15 States.

It will be found, however, that the following States have not been fairly dealt with upon that basis. Instead of having 9 Representatives Alabama should have 11. Instead of having 7 Representatives Arkansas should have 8. Instead of 8 Representatives California should have 9. Instead of 11 Representatives Georgia should have 13. Instead of having 25 Representatives Illinois should have 28, and so on down.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. How many Representatives should Massachusetts have?

Mr. DALZELL. I will go through the entire list, because it is apparent that every gentleman is interested in his own State. Instead of having 13 Representatives Indiana should have 14. Instead of having 11 Representatives Iowa should have 13. Instead of having 11 Representatives Kentucky should have 12. Instead of 7 Louisiana should have 8. Instead of 6 Maryland should have 7. Instead of 14 Representatives Massachusetts should have 16. Instead of 12 Representatives Michigan should have 14. Instead of 9 Representatives Minnesota should have 10. Instead of 16 Representatives Missouri should have 18. Instead of 10 Representatives New Jersey should have 11. Instead of 37 Representatives New York should have 41. Instead of 10 Representatives North Carolina should have 11. Instead of 21 Representatives Ohio should have 24. Instead of 32 Representatives Pennsylvania should have 36. Instead of 7 Representatives South Carolina should have 8. Instead of 10 Representatives Tennessee should have 12. Instead of 16 Representatives Texas should have 18. Instead of 1 Representative Utah should have 2. Instead of 10 Representatives Virginia should have 11. Instead of 5 Representatives West Virginia should have 6.

Mr. LACEY. What is the total increase?

Mr. DALZELL. Twenty-four States have lost according to this apportionment, upon the basis of the other 15 States, 49 Representatives, which added, as they ought to be, to the minority bill would make the representation in this House 429. The deprivation in the 24 States of the representation to which they are entitled upon the basis of the minority bill disfranchises in the 45 States of the United States 7,465,488 persons.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Has the gentleman made a computation on the same basis to find out what it would be under the majority bill?

Mr. DALZELL. I will come to that. I do not propose to do an injustice to either bill.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, it is manifest that equal and exact justice can not be done under this bill to the various States in the Union, and that a large proportion of the citizens of the United States are virtually disfranchised. Going to the other bill, for I say to my friend from Kansas I have no desire to do injustice to either, nor to advocate the cause of one bill as against the other by ignoring the inaccuracies, inequalities, or injustices of either, I would say that I undertook to make an analysis of the majority bill upon the same basis that I made the analysis of the minority bill.

I did not follow that analysis to its conclusion, because I found that so far as this matter was concerned there was very little, if any, difference between the two bills; and I came to the conclusion, as I think every gentleman will who gives any examination at all to this subject, that upon neither of the methods suggested by the Director of the Census can equal and exact justice be done to all the States of this Union in their relation to each other.

It does seem to me, however, that with the addition I have made to the majority bill—the recognition of all the majority fractions, the inclusion of the States of Florida, North Dakota, and Colorado—justice will be attained by the majority bill as nearly as justice can be attained in the making of an apportionment by any of the methods available to us under the Constitution.

The result, however, at which I have arrived is, as I have said, that justice can not be done to all the States by either of these methods; and therefore it seems to me wise to abandon figures and come to what is the only real question in this case; and that question is, not whether this House should be increased in numbers, but whether it is not already large enough, if not too large.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman heard the objections made to the minority bill on the ground that it included representation for majority fractions for the States of Nebraska and Virginia, making a House of 386. It was claimed that that would do injustice to the States of New York and Pennsylvania, because on the basis of 386 the States I have mentioned would get a Representative each. Now, if the majority bill be amended by providing representation for the three fractions unrepresented under the table of 357, would not injustice be done on the same theory to the State of Massachusetts, which on a computation of 360 gets a member, while, under the addition proposed by the gentleman, North Dakota would get the member that really belongs to Massachusetts? I do not present that as my theory, but as the theory of those who have been supporting the bill of the majority without amendment.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That is the result.

Mr. LONG. It is.

Mr. DALZELL. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. LONG. So that the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois to our computation is not correct, in the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I pass no judgment at all upon the position of the gentleman from Illinois. But what the gentleman from Kansas has just stated is entirely in accordance with what I have already stated—that I can not conceive of any method that has been suggested, or any method that has ever been followed, by which exact justice, upon the basis of figures, can be done to all the States of this Union in their relation to each other. And therefore I repeat, let us abandon the question of figures altogether; let us take the best we can take as bearing upon a certain principle, and that principle is involved in the question that I have suggested as the main question in this debate—not whether or not the membership of this House shall be increased, but whether this House is not already large enough, if not too large.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman pardon me again? I only made my suggestion in order to show that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in accord with us in the position we have taken in this case, even though he disagrees with us as to the size of the House. We welcome his support to our theory.

Mr. DALZELL. "The gentleman from Pennsylvania" is in accord partly with the minority and partly with the majority on minor questions; but nevertheless he repeats that, in his judgment, the real question involved is as to the size of the House.

Now, before I come to discuss existing conditions, I wish to submit some observations upon this subject made by so great an authority as Alexander Hamilton. In his speech on Saturday last the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] cited Alexander Hamilton, and sought to convey the impression to this House that, according to the philosophy and the rules laid down by Alexander Hamilton, he would favor an increase. I wish to show to the House, out of the writings of Alexander Hamilton, that if he were here to-day he would, to be consistent, be arguing against an increase in the membership of this House.

What was the question involved? The Constitution as it came from the Convention provided for a representation of 65 members—1 for every 30,000 inhabitants. Objection was made to that. I read from the Federalist, No. 64:

That so small a number of Representatives will be an unsafe depository of the public interests; secondly, that they will not possess a proper knowledge of the local circumstances of their numerous constituents; thirdly, that they will be taken from that class of citizens which will sympathize least with the feelings of the mass of the people and be most likely to aim at a permanent elevation of the few on the depression of the many; fourthly, that defective as the number will be in the first instance, it will be more and more disproportionate by the increase of the people and the obstacles which will prevent a correspondent increase of the Representatives.

Now, it will be observed that Mr. Hamilton is undertaking to answer these four objections in support of the proposition that the House was large enough. The House was then constituted of 65 members, one to every 30,000 inhabitants. Let us see what his reasons were, because they are as applicable to-day as they were then. He said:

In general it may be remarked on this subject that no political problem is less susceptible of a precise solution than that which relates to the number most convenient for a representative legislature. Nor is there any point on which the policy of the several States is more at variance, whether we compare their legislative assemblies directly with each other, or consider the proportions which they respectively bear to the number of their constituents.

Then he goes on and points out the difference in the proportion of Representatives in the State of Delaware as compared with those in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, and so on, and then he follows with this additional general remark:

Another general remark to be made is that the ratio between the Representatives and the people ought not to be the same where the latter are very numerous as where they are very few. Were the Representatives in Virginia to be regulated by the standard in Rhode Island, they would at this time amount to between four and five hundred, and twenty or thirty years hence to a thousand, and so on. The truth is—that in all cases a certain number, at least, seems to be necessary to secure—the benefits of free consultation and discussion, and to guard against too easy a combination for improper purposes; as on the other hand the number ought at most to be kept within a certain limit in order to avoid the confusion and intemperance of a multitude. In all very numerous assemblies of whatever character composed passion never fails to wrest the scepter from reason. Had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every Athenian assembly would still have been a mob.

He says:

Mark you—

And the observations that Mr. Hamilton made in that connection are as applicable to-day as they were when made, and have never found a more emphatic proof and illustration than they find in the history and the present condition of this House.

Now, let us advance to the other reasons assigned. He says:

The true question to be decided, then, is whether the smallness of the number as a temporary regulation be dangerous to the public liberty, whether 65 members for a few years and 100 or 200 for a few more be a safe depository for the limited and well-guarded power of legislating for the United States.

And then he goes on to show, reasoning from the character of the American citizen as he existed then, that the liberties of the people were perfectly safe in the keeping of those 65 Representatives. And, reasoning upon the same basis to-day, he would be a bold man who would deny in this House that the liberties of the people of the United States are not quite as safe in the custody of 357 members that now constitute the membership of this body.

The second charge—

He said—

against the House of Representatives is that it will be too small to possess a due knowledge of the interests of its constituents.

It is a sound and important principle that the Representative ought to be acquainted with the interests and circumstances of his constituents. But this principle can extend no further than to those circumstances and interests to which the authority and care of the Representative relate. An ignorance of a variety of minute and particular objects which do not lie within the compass of legislation is consistent with every attribute necessary to a due performance of the legislative trust. In determining the extent of information required in the exercise of a particular authority, recourse then must be had to the objects within the purview of that authority. What are to be the objects of Federal legislation? Those which are of most importance and which seem most to require local knowledge are commerce, taxation, and the militia.

And substantially the same analysis might be made to-day. And then Mr. Hamilton goes on to say with respect to these subjects of Federal legislation about which the Representatives should have knowledge:

Divide the largest State into ten or twelve districts, and it will be found that there will be no peculiar local interests in either which will not be within the knowledge of the Representative of the district.

Now, leaving that and going to the third charge, that is one upon which we need make no comment at this time—that is to say, that the House of Representatives will be taken from that class of citizens which will have lost sympathy with the mass of the people. Because our history has demonstrated that that prophecy was to be unfulfilled. But lastly and most important in this connection—

The remaining charge against the House of Representatives which I am to examine is grounded on a supposition that the number of members will not be augmented from time to time as the progress of population may demand.

Then Mr. Hamilton proceeds to show in his inimitable way how that matter has been safeguarded by the provisions of the Constitution, and then, addressing himself to the evil that he clearly foresaw, and which I say faces us to-day, the evil of too great an increase, he makes some observations that I want to press home to the conscience and the intelligence of every member of this body. He says:

One observation, however, I must be permitted to add on this subject as claiming, in my judgment, a very serious attention. It is that in all legislative assemblies the greater the number—the greater the number composing them may be the fewer will be the men who will in fact direct their proceedings. In the first place, the more numerous an assembly may be, of whatever characters composed, the greater is known to be the ascendency of passion over reason. In the next place, the larger the number the greater will be the proportion of members of limited information and of weak capacities. Now, it is precisely on characters of this description that the eloquence and address of the few are known to act with all their force.

In the ancient republics, where the whole body of the people assembled in person, a single orator or an artful statesman was generally seen to rule with as complete a sway as if a scepter had been placed in his single hand. On the same principle, the more multitudinous a representative assembly may be rendered the more it will partake of the infirmities incident to collective meetings of the people. Ignorance will be the dupe of cunning and passion the slave of sophistry and declamation.

Now, mark you again:

The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their Representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and of diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their Representatives. The countenance of the Government may become more democratic, but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer and often the more secret will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

Here, from the greatest statesman of our history, speaking over a period of a hundred years, come the three tests to measure an effective legislative assembly; that assembly whose numbers are sufficient for the purposes of safety, for the purposes of local information, and for the purpose of securing that diffusive sympathy which is necessary in the whole society.

Is there any man on this floor to-day who will declare in his place that the public safety, the interests, the liberty of the people of the United States can not be protected, safeguarded, and defended by a House of Representatives consisting of 357 members?

Is there any man here who will declare upon his responsibility as a Representative that Maine will suffer in her liberties, in her public safety, by having 3 Representatives instead of 4? Will any man contend that the people of Pennsylvania will be more secure in their liberties with 32 Representatives upon this floor instead of 30? Will any man declare in these days of rapid transit, telegraphs, telephones, and a public press that the local information necessary to care for the interests of Maine will not be as thoroughly possessed by 3 Representatives as by 4?

And the same argument will apply to each and every State in its turn.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes, but what about her strength in the electoral college?

Mr. DALZELL. We all suffer alike in that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not think so.

Mr. DALZELL. All suffer alike in that. There is no more reason why the electoral college should be increased in numbers than there is why the House of Representatives should be increased in numbers. And I submit to every fair-minded man within the sound of my voice that 357 members respond fully to the tests that are laid down by Alexander Hamilton for the constitution of an efficient and perfect legislative assembly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, leaving the domain of theory and approaching that which we ourselves know, I advance the proposition that this House is habitually turbulent and noisy and at times almost uncontrollable, and that it has reached that point where, in very many cases, the individuality of the Representative counts for absolutely nothing. Why, years ago, when this House consisted of less than 300 members, according to the testimony of distinguished statesmen now on record, it had already arrived at a point where it was disorderly, turbulent, and largely incapable of control. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] on Saturday last quoted from authorities which he supposed were authorities for him. I submit that the authorities are altogether against him. Sixty years ago a distinguished member of this House said:

> Never since he had held a seat in this House had it been so inefficient a body as it was at this moment. The deterioration had been constant, as well in the dispatch of business as in the manner and the matter of its debate, owing, as he believed, to its overgrown size.

That was not the expression of an outsider. That was the expression of a distinguished Representative, an actor on the scene, a participator in debate, his deliberate judgment that at that time a House of less than 300 members had already become inefficient, had degenerated in dispatch of business and in manner and matter of debate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are you willing to reduce the membership to 300? Are you in favor of that?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly, I am.

> Mr. Johnson said the Senate had stigmatized the House as a bear garden, and contended, for that reason, that its number must be reduced. Mr. Pickens, in making an answer to some suggestions to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Adams, said that instead of meeting here for consultation and legitimate discussion, if the House was increased in size, it would be a body thrown into confusion, and from its very numbers it would be imbecile for all the purposes laid down in the Constitution.

And even at a later day Mr. Herbert, twenty years ago, said that we all know that gentlemen now sit here for a whole Congress and do not know all of their fellow-members even by sight. Men sent here to deliberate and discuss, men sent here to consult with each other upon grave questions relating to their constituents, and sent here in such numbers that during a period of two years it is impossible that they should become personally acquainted with each other! And Mr. Morrill, a name prominent in American history—American parliamentary history—Mr. Morrill, speaking of a period forty years ago:

> Now the Speaker has to stand up all the time and speak in a stentorian voice and constantly be rapping on his desk to maintain order in a little circle round about the Chair; and it is a fact that very few members are able to participate understandingly in the transaction of business.

Now, that is only a slight exaggeration. The only exaggeration is that the Speaker is standing up all the time. If he had said he had to rap with his gavel almost all the time to prevent confusion, he would have pictured the House as it existed yesterday, as it exists to-day, and as it will exist, only in a far worse degree, when you have added to its membership 29 or 30 more.

Now, it seems like a waste of time to be arguing this proposition in a House where there is present before us at all times an object lesson.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption? It does seem to me that we do have an object lesson this morning. Here are many gentlemen desiring to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania, gathered about him listening attentively. On the other side of the Chamber and in their seats in the House there are gentlemen sitting at their desks writing letters or reading newspapers or consulting with each other. Does not that show that it is time to take away temptation—to take away the desks from the Chamber [loud applause]—so that it may be used wholly for deliberative proceedings, for those who desire to speak and for those who desire to listen?

Mr. GAINES. And it is no worse on this than on that side of the House.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Precisely; I meant no special reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if anyone desires to interrupt the member who is speaking he must rise and address the Chair, and get permission. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I supposed I addressed the Chair and received the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly; I agreed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear that.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I turned to the Speaker and then asked permission.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman was not at all in fault.

Mr. DALZELL. What the gentleman says is largely so. I have no doubt that the remedy for the evil should be determined in advance if this House is to be increased in number, which I think is inexpedient from any point of view. If it is determined to increase the number, I have no doubt the remedy suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts would afford some relief; but it would nevertheless simply amount to this: It would amount to the introduction into the House of Representatives of the United States of the absenteeism that prevails in the English House of Commons.

The result would be not that gentlemen would be here to vote, because even with this great number they perform that slight duty. Not that gentlemen would be here to vote, but that gentlemen unwilling to listen would habitually be absent from the Chamber, and what Mr. Hamilton predicted would become true. The House would be absolutely under the control of the few men who attend daily to their duties.

Now, then, I must hasten on. There are facts within the knowledge of gentlemen who have served in two or three Congresses that go to show that the truth of the position that I am arguing has been recognized in this House, and that the evil has been sought to be avoided through a long course of years by the adoption of various expedients. For example, it has been a subject of deliberation in three or four Congresses by the Committee on Rules as to whether or not the rule that admits to the privileges of the floor ought to be so changed as to exclude ex-members, it being considered that in the confusion that here prevails the exclusion even of the few gentlemen who see fit to return from time to time to the scenes of their triumphs or their defeats might add something to the order of the House.

The rules provide that the heads of Departments—the gentlemen with whom we are brought in contact in order to receive the information necessary in the performance of our legislative duties—shall have access to the floor of the House; and yet in Congress after Congress the petition of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for admission to this House has been denied, because it was conceived that not even three more men ought to be added to the number already upon the floor. Even so small a matter as the presence of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institute, who probably came here but seldom, was taken into account and some Congresses ago his name was stricken from the roll. It was thought that the absence even of one man might contribute something to the order that ought to be maintained on this floor. We have denied time and again access to this floor to the assistant sergeant-at-arms and assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Why, if any member has a constituent who calls upon him as a matter of courtesy or for business purposes he must meet him in one of the halls surrounding this House of Representatives, because the lobby is too small to accommodate 357 members of the House. For that reason visitors have been excluded from it, newspaper reporters, and others, while at the other end of the Capitol Senators have a place to receive their constituents, their families, and all who may see fit to call on them in the performance of their public duties, a privilege that every public servant ought to have, and that any properly constituted House would provide.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman suggests that much of the confusion that is had here might result if the membership was increased, and he says, citing the English House of Commons——

Mr. DALZELL. I did not cite the English House of Commons on the question of confusion.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, the question of attendance. That attendance, or lack of attendance, at the English House of Commons is ascribed to the fact that the members are paid nothing, and they do not feel bound to attend, as they do here. I do not think that analogy holds good.

Mr. DALZELL. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that he has anticipated what I was going to say. Gentlemen on this floor cite to us the House of Commons and the French Chamber of Deputies. There is no proper analogy between those houses and this House. In the discussion over the first apportionment bill some gentleman said, what has been repeated at every similar discussion since, that the House of Commons had so many and the French Chamber of Deputies had so many members, and a distinguished gentleman of that day said, and I adopt his ejaculation, "God forbid that this House should be brought into comparison with either the House of Commons or the French Chamber of Deputies."

The House of Commons is made up of representatives many of whom know nothing about the constituency that they are supposed to represent. A man is chosen from some place in England to represent some borough in Scotland where he has never been and about which he cares nothing. Members receive no emolument. I have been in the House of Commons half a dozen times and I never have seen 100 members in it. Theirs is a parliamentary Government and this is a Congressional Government. There is no proper analogy between them.

As to the French Chamber of Deputies, if there is a more disorderly, and at times disgraceful, assembly on the face of the earth, so far as parliamentary procedure is concerned, I would like to know where it is. Why, the speaker of the French Assembly is clothed with the power of, at his own sweet will as to time and occasion, adjourning the assembly by ringing a bell. [Laughter.] And times without number, if the newspapers are to be believed, within the last few years, the French Assembly has been adjourned at the bell of the speaker to avoid possible bloodshed on its floor.

As to this Chamber, we have even removed the pages that used to come at beck and call and were seated on the floor of the House; we removed them into a half-lighted room, without air or ventilation, filled with tobacco smoke, in order to get rid even of their presence on the floor of the House. All these matters are matters relating to the presence of persons on the floor. They are of small importance in comparison with other measures that have had to be taken in order to transact even as well as we do the business of the House. There was a time when there was no limitation on debate in this House.

Now there is a limitation on debate, and, however much we may regret it, there is no gentleman here who does not know that it exists as an absolute necessity; who does not know that out of the 357 members that constitute this House 300 of them have never been heard upon the floor and never can be heard under ordinary circumstances. Why, if a gentleman is asked by his constituents to present a bill in this House relating to some measure of great public importance he can not rise in his place and present that bill. He must deposit it in a box, and nobody, save the studious man who reads the RECORD and the committee to whom it is referred, unless it be reported, ever knows of its existence.

When I became a member of this House, not many years ago, there was a day when gentlemen arose in their places and presented bills sent them by their constituents, and when every man who saw fit to be in his seat knew at the end of the day just what legislation was proposed. The same method exists to-day in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, and it is a method that ought to exist everywhere in a legislative body sitting for the purpose of legislating, if it be possible. The great right of petition, for which that grand old President and statesman, John Quincy Adams, so heroically and successfully battled, what is it to-day? A mere farce.

A petition signed by thousands of your constituents relating to measures considered by them of the gravest importance, and which under the Constitution they have a right to present to this House, can not be presented to the House itself. It goes into a box and is referred to a committee, and, unless called for by the committee, is never seen by anyone save the man who presents it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What is the remedy for it?

Mr. DALZELL. The remedy that existed when the House was small and when bills and petitions were presented in this House as they are on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does that fulfill the constitutional function to give the people their right of representation?

Mr. DALZELL. That is one aspect of the question we are debating.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania vote for the present rules?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, and I would vote for them again, and again, and again. And if that side of the House were to come into power, they would have to take them because they would find, as they did find in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, that this House can not be governed except under such rules.

Mr. GAINES. I never have and I never will.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, sir, the reports of committees which used to be presented openly in this House, and ought to be so presented, are disposed of now in the same way as bills introduced. And then even, as to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was found that this House, with 357 members, could not go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and successfully transact business; so that it was finally agreed, both sides of the House consenting, that a quorum in the Committee of the Whole should be reduced to 100 members.

Mr. LONG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Is there any material difference between the rules as we have them now, with a House of 357 members, and the rules as we had them in the Fifty-first Congress, with a House of 325 members?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all.

Mr. LONG. Then what difference would there be between a House of 386 members and a House of 357 members in regard to the points that the gentleman makes?

Mr. DALZELL. Just the same difference that there is between 357 and 325. It is harder to control this House and transact business efficiently under any rules with 357 members than it was in the Fifty-first Congress with 325. And the difficulty will be increased with every accession to the membership of this House.

Now, I must hasten on. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky rose.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me; I have only ten minutes left.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Just a moment. I have listened very attentively to what the gentleman has been saying about the restrictions on debate in this House. Now, I ask, is that due to the increased membership of the House or to the tendency of either party that may dominate the House to cut off debate on the opposite side?

Mr. DALZELL. I think it is due to the increased membership.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. DALZELL. It is due to the impossibility of furnishing an opportunity for every member to join in debate.

Mr. Speaker, there are on the roster of this House—I have not counted them, but I venture the assertion there are fifteen useless committees, committees that never meet, that have no business to perform, to which a bill is never referred, and which exist as committees only in name. Why? Because the Speaker has to find a place on committee for every one of the 357 members. Not only that, but every main committee of this House, every committee charged with important business in this House, has had its numbers so increased that it is absolutely impossible to stow away another man in the committee room. Yet you propose to find committee places for 29 additional members.

Mr. Speaker, I have not time to dwell further on this aspect of the case. I come now to my last proposition. I deny the affirmation that even under the rules as we have them this is an efficient House. I say it is an inefficient House; and let the record show it. In the Fifty-fourth Congress there were presented in the House and the Senate 14,114 bills and 470 resolutions—a total of 14,584. Of those bills and resolutions of more or less importance there were reported in this House the beggarly number of 2,815; and there were passed and became law the still more beggarly number of 984—984 out of a total of 14,584. But that is not all or the worst of it. The Senate of the United States, with no cloture, with no previous question, with unlimited debate, passed 1,682 bills to 948 passed by the House of Representatives; and the difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives is the difference between 90 men without rules and 357 men held to the performance of their duties by the strictest of rules.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress there were introduced in the House 10,547 bills and in the Senate 5,855, or a total of 16,402; and there were reported in this House the beggarly number of 2,112, and passed, 1,461.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment? Does he bear in mind the fact that the English House of Commons, with a quorum of only 40, passed only 299 bills last year?

Mr. DALZELL. I have said that there is no analogy between the House of Commons and this representative body.

Mr. HILL. There is in size and working force.

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. That is an executive body; this is a legislative body. That is a Parliamentary body; this is a Congressional body. Their Government is a Parliamentary Government; our Government is a Congressional Government. The difference is so vast that it is impossible to make any comparison between them.

Only one word more. In the present Congress, according to the RECORD, there were introduced up to last Saturday night 13,300 bills in this House and 5,414 in the Senate—a total of 18,714; and we have managed to have reported up to this time 2,100 of those bills.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me ask the gentleman one question covering, I think, this whole proposition. May not the determination of a bill which the committee determines not to report to the House be just as wise a legislative policy as reporting a bill? Is not the gentleman going upon the assumption that all legislation proposed by bills introduced is wise legislation?

Mr. DALZELL. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that, because I had omitted to say that in the Fifty-fifth Congress, counting what the gentleman speaks of, bills that were reported adversely, and resolutions reported adversely, and all matters of legislation passed upon, the Senate disposed of 2,114 as against 1,461 in the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many of them were passed by Senatorial courtesy which never should have passed?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that the wisdom of the rules of the House was vindicated when the House refused to pass a lot of those bills that came over here from the Senate, considering the manner in which those bills are gotten through the Senate?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; I think anything done by the rules of the House is all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Really, I must either quit or——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the consent of the Chair must be obtained before a gentleman is interrupted.

Mr. DALZELL. I assume that my time has about concluded.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended fifteen minutes. It is in the interest of the members of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I decline that for the reason that other gentlemen are to follow me.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but other gentlemen are to follow me, and I am not willing to take any portion of their time. [Applause.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

[Mr. BINGHAM addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I will take up the subject of Pennsylvania at the point where the gentleman laid it down. For twenty years, with the political power in the hands of the party to which the gentleman has belonged, they have seen fit to ignore the apportionment made by Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Did the gentleman say twenty years?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Twenty years.

Mr. BINGHAM. Permit me to correct the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it has been twenty years.

Mr. BINGHAM. The last apportionment was made in 1887.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, then, for thirteen years. At that time did you have all of your Congressmen?

Mr. BINGHAM. You mean twenty years?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then you reaffirm your statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know what I am talking about. For thirteen years, according to the gentleman's own statement, this same magnificent county of Philadelphia has gone without her proportion of representative force in the House of Representatives, while they have elected two members at large throughout the State. Now, under the recent census the State of Pennsylvania increased her population by something over a million.

Mr. BINGHAM. One million and forty-four thousand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And of that number 246,000 were in the county of Philadelphia and 223,000 were in the county of Allegheny, making nearly half a million of people. Now, the proposition is to reapportion the State, or else my friend's appeal is in vain, by giving to those cities the just measure of their deserts that they have been powerless to obtain for all these years.

Mr. BINGHAM. We can not do this ourselves.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You did not have any legislatures in session?

Mr. BINGHAM. We do not have this legislature.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then there is something peculiar about this legislature that has not been about other legislatures. I think there is no special peculiarity about this legislature.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there is the whole trouble. Take my own State of Ohio, where we made a splendid gain of 485,229—almost half a million. Five counties of that State made almost 300,000 of that gain—Hamilton County, Cuyahoga County, Lucas County, Franklin County, and Montgomery County. Now, the smaller you make the ratio the more power, relatively, you put into those counties and the fractional parts thereof. So, under the Burleigh bill we find, instead of four Representatives from the great cities of Ohio, we shall have nearly two and a half ratios in Cuyahoga, two and forty-odd thousand in Hamilton County, almost a ratio in Franklin, and almost a ratio in Lucas County, while all the balance of the State will have the pleasure of dividing up about 15 members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow an interruption there? Is not that whole matter of the division of the State a function of the State legislature?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, very well——

Mr. BINGHAM. This House has nothing to do with it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Apparently it has had a great deal to do with it. Now, with reference to New York, the Burleigh bill proposes to add three members from the State of New York. Where will they be located? That portion of the State above the Harlem River has not gained in population except in a single county materially, and the whole three of these members is simply a peace offering which is now proposed to be tendered to the political power dominating below the Harlem, Tammany Hall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no interest or feeling in regard to this bill. I would not vote to keep any man out or to bring any man in. I have one general idea in regard to the power of the people of a State over its representation in Congress. I do not believe in this country it is necessary that Congress shall legislate and affect the whole of the country by its legislation in order that some one or two or three particular gentlemen shall be kept in Congress or that any particular State shall be protected beyond its deserts, for while I believe my friend from Pennsylvania is right in saying the legislature of the State has power over its Congressional districts, I am right in saying that the people of a State have power over the election of their Representatives; and it will not occur shortly that any action of Congress will keep any distinguished man out of Congress and send a less valuable one in his place.

I put my support of this bill on the ground that it is a smaller number of Representatives than any other bill. I would cheerfully and gladly vote for a scheme of 300 members of the House. I have listened to this discussion about the French Chamber of Deputies and the British House of Commons. Why, Mr. Speaker, the members of the British House of Commons are not in any sense such representative men of their constituencies as we are. It is a rare thing in an ordinary session of the House of Commons to find above a hundred members present and therefore it is that they have cut down the quorum of their House to 40, in order that about 40 members can go there and transact business.

The average member of the House of Commons in England is a gentleman who has wealth enough and is powerful enough to go to London to live, is wealthy enough to live without salary, and to be within telephonic or telegraphic reach in case of a political division in the House, so that he may go in and ascertain his duty as an individual, then vote, and leave immediately.

And the same is true of the representative assembly of the people of France. There is no comparison. The English member of the House of Commons has no necessity for a desk. He has nothing to do with the rules of the house, he does not have to have a digest, and has nothing to do with the list of members. He does not care anything about that; he does not need a directory. Nine out of ten of them have no great business connection with their constituents at home. I have heard this talk about taking the desks out of this House. I do not believe that it will ever be done.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], if he desires to make the effort, will have an opportunity when the sundry civil bill comes here to move to strike out the appropriation for the improvement of the Hall that is now contemplated and substituting the removal of the desks, and I venture to say that he will not get 10 votes in this House in favor of his project. It never had any support, except here and there an American gentleman journeying to London who thought he saw something rather attractive by looking down from the gallery, where he was able to get a seat that some member of Parliament did not occupy—for more than one-third of them have to sit in the gallery, if they ever come there, as they do occasionally on festal occasions—and thought he saw something nice in a man sitting on a bench with his hat on his head, something that looked perfectly unique and unusual, and rushed back to America and spoke or wrote it up in our magazines for publication.

We are business representatives of active, stirring constituents, and one-half of our practical efficiency comes from the presence of the desks and the uses that we make of them. Therefore I would vote for the smaller rather than the larger House. Two million and a half dollars added to the expense of a decade of the House of Representatives is a matter of some moment and importance. The argument that some Eastern State—and it is very strange that it is necessary for us to pass this bill in order to give to Maine her present representation, when by doing so we shall give to Connecticut, another New England State, an increase, a Democratic increase, beyond all possibility of the surveying of lines.

Now, what are we to do in the future? It appears that we are following precedents, going back as far as Hamilton. To-day we propose that we will not allow any State to lose a Representative except Nebraska. I do not see any method of saving Nebraska unless we take in about 400. I should like to know why not Nebraska? Why do we not take in Nebraska? Why legislate against Nebraska, a growing, splendid State, with the chances of the future enhanced 1,000 per cent within the last three months? [Laughter.] Why not? Why should we leave Nebraska out and yet proclaim our purpose to leave nobody out? Let us see what we are coming to.

We can not hope that all the States can maintain their proportion of population always. Some States will naturally fall off. That must be so. Fourteen counties of Indiana shrunk in their population under this census. More than that number in Ohio shrunk in their population in this census. Westward as you go the population increases more rapidly, so that Iowa did not fall off in a single county in that State. Here is the logic, here is the force of all that. If the criterion is to be in the East, and the Western State is to be maintained, necessarily, under all the circumstances, what will be the size of this body twenty years from now?

I read in a newspaper to-day that it was absurd to talk about the size of this Hall. Possibly that may be. It may be true that this country is rich enough to build a new Capitol and a new Hall of Representatives, but this Congress can not legislate to increase the power of the voice of the Speaker, nor swell the momentum of power of the voice of every member on this floor, and I do not know but that it is about as important that the size of the Hall shall conduce to the voice of the State being heard by a few Representatives as it is that the voice of the State shall be heard by the mere vote of a Representative, when his voice can not be heard, unless we adopt a system of megaphone communication between the Chair and the members of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman thinks the people ought to be heard by the voice of their Representatives?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. SIMS. And yet we are running under a lot of rules that shut the mouths of more than one-half of the House on almost every bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the country is not suffering in that direction. [Laughter.] The gentleman is misapprehending the rules of the House. He could not make a better set of rules if he should try. The only great modification of the rules were made in the Fifty-first Congress, and were subsequently adopted by the Democrats in the Fifty-third, when they found it was indispensable to do so. I differ with my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and I want to compliment him, as he did me, by saying that he is a man of distinguished power, and learning, and knowledge, but, in my judgment, he is just slightly affected with a special prejudice against the rules of the House. [Laughter.]

I deny that it is impossible to pass legislation in this House. I make the statement without any purpose of bluster. I state over again what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says he has heard me say—if I have behind me an assured majority of a quorum of this House, I can pass any bill on the Calendar of this House, with or without the action and friendly cooperation of the Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I understand, there is but one species of machinery under our rules by which the gentleman can do that, and that is by a conspiracy or agreement among the chairmen of all the committees that upon a call of the committees each one of them will drop out and say that he has no business to call up. Is not that the only course open to the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is one way. That applies only to one character of business. There is only one character of business that can be brought up in that sort of way.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask my friend from Ohio to state the process by which he would accomplish the object he has stated. I am afraid my friend has something up his sleeve that he has not let the rest of us know about. I would be glad if he would enlighten the House by showing how, with his majority back of him and without the friendly aid of the Speaker, he can pass any proposition in this House. I say he can not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, I know; and I guess that is as far as we shall get in this controversy to-day. Mr. Speaker, I illustrated to the House and the country once what could be done here, after the scheme was practically abandoned by everybody else.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was on the Hawaiian bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir; when the Hawaiian bill was brought up. That is one thing. When I am brought up for a civil-service examination I will tell the balance, but not until then. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We want to know how the rest of us can get our bills passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to speak a moment or two more on this question.

I believe it will be discovered that if the Burleigh bill passes—and I very much fear it will—we shall have turned over 25 per cent of the power of the Fifty-eighth Congress to the cities of this country; we shall have stripped the entire rural districts of the country of their just measure of power in this body; we shall have turned over to the great centers of population the power to control the legislation of Congress. I can show that; and I will try to do so in extending my remarks.

I want to say a few words now on what is known here as the Crumpacker proposition. I am opposed to the disfranchisement of the colored men of the South, and I have placed myself upon the records of the country in a magazine article giving fully my reasons; and my position on that question does not apply to the question, Which is the stronger, or which shall have the greater political power in the future?

Mr. OTEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY]?

Mr. OTEY. I make the point that the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman from Virginia is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope I may have five minutes more.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well; I give the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am delighted that my friend from Virginia is watching the clock and aiding the Speaker in administering the rules of the House.

Mr. OTEY. I do not object to the gentleman occupying fifteen or twenty minutes more, if he does not take it out of my time, and that is what he is doing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not take anything out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. OTEY. You are doing so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is taking from the time of both of us now. I am willing that the gentleman shall have all the time he wants as soon as I have occupied my five minutes.

Mr. OTEY. It was agreed that I should have thirty minutes; but now it appears that I am to be cut down to five.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; the gentleman can say more in five minutes than the average member of Congress can in twenty minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. OTEY. If it be agreed that I shall have twenty minutes, I will move to extend the gentleman's time for half an hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have five minutes, and I would like to go on.

My opposition—I would rather say hostility, for that is the better term—to the disfranchisement of the colored man is because I sympathize with, and feel a great interest in, the people of the South. I have no prejudice on this question; and the gentleman from Mississippi the other day in his very eloquent appeal on this subject fired over my head. I would act here with just as much energy in behalf of a measure for the benefit of the eleven States of the South with which I was at enmity as I would for any State of the North.

My votes have spoken upon that question. My position is that in a free government dependent upon the will of the people there can be no disfranchisement without absolute injury to the Commonwealth in which the disfranchised persons reside. I know that sometimes some benefit may appear to flow from such disfranchisement, but I point out the fact that long ago—during all of the last thirty years—the white people of the South have built up their civilization, their intelligence, their patriotism, their education, against the ignorant and whatever else pertains to the colored man's character, and some white men also; yet during all those thirty years, with the exception of the brief period following the war, the white man with his intelligence has controlled the Government, and to-day there is in this House of Representatives but a single colored man from all that vast population, and he, I presume, will be the last of his race for many years to come.

By this policy of disfranchisement you make enemies of a race that want to be your friends. You put into the body politic a great body or class of pariahs. You brand them with a condition little short of slavery. I know that the educational systems of the South are to-day liberal to the colored men. Will they always be so? Will they continue? Let us see what you are doing. You demand the disfranchisement of the colored man. Then you say that you do it because he is ignorant, because he might vote against the best interests of the white people.

Are you sure that when you have accomplished that you will not go a step further and deprive him of the educational facilities that are rapidly bringing him up to the standard which you yourselves have set? Take the case of North Carolina, with almost two colored children attending the schools of the State where there is one white child, in proportion to the relative strength of the two races there. Are you quite sure, my friend, that the next aggressive step will not be legislation that will tend to keep in this condition of unfitness, as you call it, these very people whom you are now legislating against? That is my objection. I care nothing about this question of representation in Congress in comparison.

If the people of the North and the East and the West and the rapidly growing sentiment of the South, educated as it is by the wealth and intelligence of this country, can not protect ourselves against the political power of the South, I am willing to go down in the political vortex that is coming. But what I say to you is that the danger exists that you are transforming a class of friends into a class of registered enemies—enemies of record. I fear that you will have trouble in that direction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, that government wherein all the people meet together to enact laws and select persons to execute them is the ideal "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

This, however, is impracticable in a country of any considerable number of people. Hence it is that, in addition to delegating the execution of law to certain individuals, the people delegate the power to make laws to certain representatives; hence republican government. The right to participate in the selection of the Representatives who are to make the laws is one of the dearest, if not the dearest, right of the American citizen. In its defense he will sacrifice his money, his property, and even his life, if need be.

We are proud of our Government. We claim to be a nation of sovereigns. Yet how thin is the toga of representative government in which we so proudly envelop ourselves.

One coordinate branch of our Government is the Supreme Court of the United States. With the selection of this court the people have nothing to do directly. Its members are appointed by the President of the United States, and when once appointed hold for life or during good behavior. The people directly have no say whatever as to the members of this august tribunal, whose decision finally determines what the law is, and whose fiat may overturn the express act of the other coordinate branches of the Government. They are not responsible to the people, and when once appointed are absolutely independent of the appointing power.

The President is selected by the people, and yet here the people vote by States through the electoral college and not directly. He is the head of the executive department of the Government, and he, and not the people, appoints the real executors of the people's will.

The other coordinate branch of the Government and, primarily, the lawmaking power is Congress, composed of the Senate and the House of Representatives. This is supposed to be the citadel of our republican Government. Through this we exercise our sovereignty. With the selection of the Senate, however, we have nothing to do directly. Its members are selected by the legislatures of the different States and are supposed to represent the States themselves.

This leaves us the House of Representatives. Here we find the direct agents of the people. The members of the House represent directly the will of the people of this great country. The people vote directly for them and against them. To them they write, telling all their troubles. Through them they speak and through them they act. They are not only the representatives of the people, but they are the servants and errand boys of the people. Hence it is that a bill looking toward the apportionment of these Representatives to the different States of the Union is one fraught with the greatest importance. It determines for the next ten years the degree in which each citizen shall be represented in his Government and in the enactment of laws by which his rights shall be determined and protected. It also determines for the next ten years the votes that each State shall have in selecting the Chief Magistrate of our country and the head of its executive department. These measures always have been justly considered of vast importance.

The bill reported by the committee has all the importance of previous bills of a similar character, but it is more important for another reason. It contemplates limiting and fixing the number of members that shall constitute the House of Representatives. It not only determines the degree in which each citizen of this country shall be represented in the lawmaking power of the Government now, but it also says that hereafter the House of Representatives shall consist of no greater number than is prescribed in this bill. It does not say this in so many words, but that is the idea of the bill and of the committee.

So it is that at the very threshold of the consideration of this bill we are confronted with a question of transcendent importance. It seems to me that this is one of the most important questions we have ever considered, and it is one that should be determined at the very outset in the consideration of this bill. It is a question that affects every Representative here and every citizen in this Union. You can not say: "The representation of my State is not changed by either bill; therefore we are not interested." You and your people are interested in future representation which is directly affected by this bill. Furthermore, you are interested in seeing justice done as nearly as possible to every citizen of this Republic as well as to those of your own State. Only a short time ago the whole country was aflame over a bill affecting the people of Porto Rico. Many who are indifferent as to these two bills were frantic at legislation which they considered as striking at the liberties of a distant people. That was beneficent legislation. This means the direct curtailment of the highest privilege of every citizen of this Republic.

From the foundation of this Government to the present every apportionment bill has taken into consideration the growth of the country and has increased the representation of the people, with the possible exception of the apportionment bill under the Sixth Census, in 1843, when the number was fixed at 223, a reduction of 17. This reduction was not made, however, with the idea that the House was large enough or too large. At the very next census, however, 1853, an increase was made to 233, and from that time to the present there has been a steady increase. The census of 1863 made an increase over the preceding census of 10; in 1873, of 50; in 1883, of 32, and in 1893, of 31, so that the number fixed at the Eleventh Census was 356, which has been increased by the admission of another State to 357. Even with this constant increase the power of individual citizenship has been decreasing. The substance is gradually becoming shadow. In the First Congress there was 1 Representative for every 30,000 people. To-day there is 1 for every 173,901. One citizen then had almost as much influence as 6 have now.

Under the bill of the committee there will be 1 Representative to every 208,868, while under the bill of the minority it will be 1 to every 194,182. Is not this a sufficient decrease in the representation of the individual citizen? Shall we, the representatives of the people, say now that this representative body shall cease to grow? That, though we have 10,000,000 more people than we had in 1890, they shall have no more Representatives? That, though in 1910 we may have 85,000,000 people, they shall have no more Representatives than when their number amounted to 62,000,000? I can not think so. The nineteenth century has been a most wonderful century for us. Our growth and development have been marvelous. They have surpassed the wildest dreams of the most visionary. In territory, population, commerce, manufactures, agriculture, mining, invention, science, art, education, culture, literature, and in all that makes civilization and a great nation we have rivaled the fables of antiquity.

We enter the twentieth century with a boundless hope and possibilities foreshadowed by the accomplishments of the nineteenth. Shall we mark our legislative advent into the twentieth century with an act pointing to the downfall of representative government? I believe in our Government and in our people. I have no fears of tyranny or empire in this country; but I do say, that, in my judgment, when this nation does go the way of all nations of the past, the beginning of the end will be when the growth of the representative branch of the Government ceases. The further the representatives get away from the people, from the individual citizen, the more insecure our liberties and the more liable our Government to decay. The nearer they stay to the people, the closer they are in touch with the individual citizen, the more stable will be our Government, and the more secure our liberties.

But it is said the House is too large now, and while we will not decrease it, it must not be made larger. Is this true? How does it compare with other representative bodies? Great Britain, with a population of 37,731,410, has 670 members in the House of Commons; France, with a population of 38,343,192, has 584 members of the Chamber of Deputies; Germany, with a population of 49,428,470, has 397 members in the Reichstag; Italy, with a population of 30,535,848, has 508 members in the Chamber of Deputies; Spain, with a population of 17,565,632, has 431 members in Congress, the representative body of the Cortes; Austria-Hungary has a population of 42,762,886 and has two parliaments.

The representative part in Austria has 353 members and in Hungary 453. In other words, the representative branch of every great government in the world to-day is larger than ours, and we have to-day proportionately the smallest representative body in the world. What will our citizens think when they consider that the citizen of England, Germany, France, Spain, Italy, and Austria is more nearly represented than they? What will they think of Representatives who boast of the greatness of our country and the beauties of our Government and then by their votes say our people shall have fewer Representatives than any other great nation of the world to-day? It seems to me that this fact alone should condemn the proposition.

Why would a slight increase in the present membership hinder the dispatch of business in this House? Every member knows that the business of the House is very largely done in committees, and that these committees expedite business rather than the House itself. The increase of even one member on each committee would not hinder nor delay the enactment of legislation. As a matter of fact, it is an open question whether or not there is not too much business done here, rather than too little. It would be probably far better for the country if a great deal of the legislation which is enacted were not consummated. One thing is assured, and that is that the increase of 10, 20, or 30 members in this body will not unreasonably delay or hinder the passage of any measure of importance to the people.

There is no question but that a great part of the business of this House is done with only a small proportion of its membership present. During this Congress there have been only a few measures that have called forth the entire strength or the greatest membership of the House. It is also true that measures deserving of the consideration of all the members of the House and in which the whole country is interested are given consideration by the entire membership, and, as a usual thing, the full body of the House is recorded upon such measures.

Such was true in the noted Roberts case; such was true in the Porto Rican legislation, and such will also be the case in matters in which the whole people of this country consider themselves vitally interested.

Is it thought that with 30 more members there would have been less dispatch in the Roberts case or there would have been less ready action in the Porto Rican matter than with the 357? I think not. It may be true that there might be a little more independent action upon the part of members of this House if the membership were somewhat increased. As everyone knows, the business of this House is practically controlled by not exceeding a dozen members in this body. They say what legislation shall be considered. They say when it shall be considered. They say whether or not it shall be passed. And especially matters that partake to a certain extent of partisanship are considered in such a way as to almost compel members to vote against their honest judgment.

If an increase in the membership would bring a little more independence of thought and action, it might be much better for the people. The Speaker of the House would have just as much power with an increased number as he has now, and it rests very largely with him to say what legislation shall be considered, when it shall be considered, and whether or not it shall be passed. We have a membership now of 357, the Senate has a membership of 90, and yet in the dispatch of business, in consideration and passage of important measures, the House will certainly favorably compare with the Senate.

It is true that with an increased membership there would also be an increased expense, and yet in a matter that involves the rights of the people and the right of participating in the Government this is a question that should not and will not have any weight with the people. Every man would be willing to pay a little more in order to retain more of that inviolable right of self-government. Furthermore, each Representative in this House now represents about 173,000 people. With 357 members, with the present population, he would represent about 208,000 people. This is as much as any man can reasonably represent and do justice to his constituents, especially where he has a diversity of interests in his district. If you make no increase in the membership, then you will find each member getting further and further away from his people and his constituency, doing less for each one of them, and becoming less and less a representative of the people.

With a gradual increase of membership we keep closer to the people. We know more of their wants and have more time to look after their necessities. It may be that some of the members from some of the districts of this country have but very little to do that directly affects their constituency. They can give their attention to matters of general legislation, but it is different with me. The constituency I represent are directly interested in almost every matter of national legislation coming before Congress.

Is there a River and Harbor Committee? Our people are directly interested in appropriations made by that committee. Is there an Interstate Commerce Committee? We are directly interested in its business, work, and legislation in the way of commerce, lighthouses, life-saving stations, etc. Is there a Military Committee? We have our Army posts and fortifications to look after. Is there a Naval Committee? We have battle ships to build and navy-yards to maintain. We have public lands, arid lands, Indian affairs, forest reserves, and claims of all kinds. We have great mining interests, manufacturing interests, fishing interests, lumber interests, and almost every industry in which the people of any section of this country are interested.

Some say that our Hall is not large enough. If that be true, we must make it larger. Representation in this country can not be restricted by wooden walls. If this room can not be made large enough, the people will say and demand that we shall build another that is large enough. Shall we say that our legislative body and the Government of which we are so proud shall be less than that of the Monarchies of Europe? Shall we say that the participation of the citizen of this country in the administration of its Government shall be less than in the Governments of the Old World? Will we be justified in saying that the citizen of this country shall have less to say in the enactment of legislation for his Government than a citizen of those countries?

When the number 356 was adopted in 1890 there was no thought then in the minds of the members of the House of Representatives that there should be no further increase except by the admission of new States. There were some, it is true, who thought that the House was large enough, and yet they were very few. Mr. Frank, of Missouri, stated, "But as long as Congress indulges in special class legislation in private bills instead of confining itself to general and national legislation, it is absolutely indispensable that the number of Representatives be increased."

And Representative Taylor said, "And if you will look over the increase in representation made from decade to decade, you will find that we have had to the present membership almost precisely the average number in the increase made from time to time during the last hundred years."

Mr. Tillman, of South Carolina, said, referring to the size of the House and its increase: "It is so in England, from whom we inherit every institution that is worth preserving or worthy of praise," and he was in favor of making the House a body composed of 600 members and the Senate of 300.

What is the object and purpose of an apportionment bill? The Constitution says Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, etc. The object of every bill, of course, is to carry out this provision of the Constitution, and, leaving out now the question as to whether or not the membership shall stay as it is and taking the position that it should be increased and arguing in favor of the bill reported by the minority, let us see which measure comes nearer to carrying out the intention of the Constitution.

The only real question to be considered is that this apportionment shall be made according to population. The power of the State, the wealth of the State, the manufactures of the State have no bearing upon this proposition. The State that has the people is the State entitled to representation, whether it has the material wealth or not.

It has been endeavored in the past to apportion these Representatives by some mathematical system, and the majority of the committee reported in favor of making this apportionment according to the system which they say has been used in the past. That is, to first determine the membership of which the House shall be composed and then apply that number successively to the population of the different States; then again to apply it to the fractions, giving representation to every major fraction and the number determined upon as reached, and then stop.

An examination of the debates in connection with the apportionments in the past and an examination of the tables submitted in the report of the committee show that no system has ever yet been devised that has carried out the provision of the Constitution. It seems to me, from the very nature of things, that it is absolutely impossible to devise a mathematical system by which injustice will not be done. The population of the various States is not based upon any mathematical system. Each one has to be considered independently of the other, and from this naturally results the fact that no mathematical system can be applied to them in this apportionment.

Furthermore, the argument of this question proceeds apparently upon the theory that the people composing these fractions are not represented at all. This is not the case. The Representatives are not apportioned to the districts, but to the States, which are divided into districts so that all the people of the State are represented; and it seems to me that the real difficulty is to secure an apportionment of the Representatives to the State in such a way that when the State is divided into districts there will be as little difference among all the various districts of the State and the nation as possible. In other words, if we could so apportion the Representatives that each district would have exactly the number that could be represented by one member, this would be in exact accord with the requirements of the Constitution. As it is impossible to do this, then it seems to me that we should get as near to it as possible. If we have to do violence to any mathematical system in order to do it, it is but our plain duty to see that it is done, as justice should be placed above mathematics in such a matter.

Now, let us compare the two bills presented to the House. Under the bill represented by the committee the district with the least population would be in Vermont, with a population of 171,820, and the district with the highest population would be in Colorado, with 269,551. Thus the variation between the lowest and highest district would be 97,731 people. By this you see that a Congressman in Vermont represents 171,820 people, while a Congressman in Colorado represents 269,551 people. In the State of Colorado there are 92,451 and in the State of Washington there are 85,966 more people in the district than in Vermont.

Under the bill submitted by the minority the lowest district has 171,820 people, the same as in the majority and in the State of Vermont, and the largest district would be in Rhode Island, with 214,278 people, or a variation between the lowest and highest of only 42,458. Leaving out States with but two Congressmen, the variation in the committee bill is 191,760 for the lowest, West Virginia, and the highest, 231,488, in Maine, or a difference of 39,728; while under the minority bill the lowest is 173,080, in Arkansas, and the highest is 203,188, in Alabama, or a difference of 30,000. Now, it seems to me that under the minority bill, with so much difference in the variations, the Representatives are more nearly apportioned to the different States in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution than in the majority bill. While it is true that the principle adopted by the majority has been used in the past, yet it never has been used in the way now applied by the majority.

There were two reasons given in 1890 for the selection of the number 356, and they were considered as the main reasons, first, because, taking the number 356 and applying it as a rule which required that no State with a fraction greater than a major fraction should be left without representation for that major fraction. This is not true under the committee bill. In fact, there are three States with a majority fraction for which they get no representation, and the injustice of applying this ironclad rule is manifest when we see that Colorado, with a fraction of 121,367, is given no representation, while Michigan, with a fraction of 123,434, is given an additional Representative.

In other words, 2,067 people in Michigan gives Michigan an additional Representative. It would be much more just and equitable to give to Colorado an additional Representative instead of Michigan, and it would make each citizen of Colorado and Michigan more nearly represented according to the spirit of the Constitution than under the bill of the committee. As it is, it takes 269,551 people in Colorado for 1 Representative, while in Michigan it only takes 201,748 for 1 Representative. As a matter of fact, the rule adopted by the majority, if applied at all, should give increased representation to the smaller States having the majority fraction, first, because their fraction will be divided among fewer Representatives than in the larger States, and in this way the relative influence of each citizen in the conduct of the Government would be more nearly equalized.

The apportionment in the minority bill is made in accordance with the rule of the majority, except that, in order to take care of two major fractions, the bill arbitrarily gives 2 Representatives to two different States. This has been in the interest of justice. Of course, according to the majority's theory, this does an injustice to other States, and this arises from the argument that a major fraction is not represented at all if no Representative is allowed for it. But when we go to divide the States into districts in accordance with the bill of the minority we find that the districts are more nearly of a uniform size than under the bill of the majority.

The unreliability of this so-called system is glaringly illustrated in the fact that if the membership of the House should be fixed at 356, or less, Colorado would gain a member; if fixed at 357 she would not gain a member, and if fixed at 358, or more, she would gain 1 member.

The honorable chairman of this committee, in order to show the injustice of the Burleigh bill, took 173,617, the number of persons to which 1 Representative is accorded under the Burleigh bill in Maine, and applied it to the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Ohio, Texas, and Iowa, and by computation showed that if each of these States were given a Representative for each 173,617, they would be entitled to more Representatives than are given each of them by the Burleigh bill. He claimed that this was very unjust and appealed to them for their votes on behalf of his bill by reason of this alleged injustice. He refused to make any comparison with the number of people that his bill requires in the State of Washington to make 1 Representative, to wit, 257,786. He refused to show that by applying this ratio to each of these States they would be really entitled to a much smaller number of Representatives than are given by his bill.

But let us take exactly the same method of argument upon his bill that he took upon the Burleigh bill and see whether or not he has acted fairly by these large States according to his own argument. Under his bill Vermont has 1 Representative for every 171,820 people. Now, let us apply that same ratio to each of these other States, because if Vermont is entitled to 1 Representative for each 171,820 people, should not each of these other States be entitled to 1 for that number? They should according to his argument.

How does his bill treat them? Applying this ratio to New York it would be entitled to 42 Representatives; he gives it only 35. Pennsylvania would be entitled to 36, and that without counting fractions; he gives it only 30. Illinois would be entitled to 28; she gets 23. Iowa would be entitled to 12; she gets 11. Minnesota would be entitled to 10; she gets 8. Massachusetts would be entitled to 16; she gets 13. Texas would be entitled to 17; she gets 15; and carrying it further, Missouri would get 17; she gets 15. Wisconsin would get 12; she gets 10. California would get 8, with a large fraction; she gets 7. Michigan would get 14, while she gets 12. Indiana would get 14; she gets 12. Colorado 3, with a large fraction, but she gets 2. Florida 3, and she gets 2. The States of North Dakota, Montana, Maine, and Connecticut with their population would be entitled to 12; they get 9. Colorado, Florida, and Washington would be entitled to 10, giving 1 for the major fraction; they get 6.

If the Burleigh bill is in the frying pan the Hopkins bill is in the fire.

It seems to me that the proper method to make this apportionment is by determining the ratio of population for each Representative and apply this ratio to each State, taking the number resulting therefrom and add to it 1 Representative for each major fraction. This is a simple rule. It is a just rule. It is easy of application. It involves no paradoxes and does substantial justice to all as nearly as can be, and is constitutional, as stated by Mr. Webster.

If you take 194,000 as the ratio for each Representative, then giving one Representative for each 194,000 and major fraction would give a membership of 387 and would leave no State with a major fraction for which no Representative is given. Under such an apportionment the representation would be just as it is in the Burleigh bill with the exception of Iowa, which would have 12. Under this apportionment the State with the largest number of people to each Representative would be Rhode Island, with 214,278, or a variation of 20,278 above the ratio. The State with the fewest number of people to one Representative is North Dakota, with one Representative for 157,217, or a variation below the ratio of 36,773. Total variation between the highest and lowest districts, 57,051. Under the Hopkins bill the highest number of people to one district is in Colorado, with 269,551, or a variation above the ratio of 60,633, while the State with the lowest district is Vermont, with 171,820 people, or a variation below the ratio of 37,048, or a total variation between the highest and lowest districts of 97,681.

Leaving out the small States with 4 Representatives and under, we find the following extreme variation under this method of apportionment:

Alabama has 1 Representative for 203,188, or a variation of 9,188 above the ratio, while Nebraska, with 178,089 people to 1 Representative, or a variation below the ratio of 15,911, or a total variation between the highest and lowest of only 25,099. Under the Hopkins bill South Carolina has 1 Representative to every 223,386, or a variation of 14,518 above the ratio, while West Virginia has 1 Representative to every 191,760, or a variation below the ratio of 19,108, or a total variation between the highest and lowest districts of 33,626.

If you give 1 Representative for every 194,000 and major fraction you have a House of 387 members, and give full representation to 151,770 more people than under the Burleigh bill. And you violate no mathematical system in so doing. By adding 1 more member to the Burleigh bill for the large fraction belonging to Iowa you accomplish the same thing so far as representation is concerned, except that still you give full representation apparently to 55,919 less people than by the above method. In fact, however, you give each State exactly the same representation, and therefore the result is exactly the same. In the one case the result is brought about entirely by a mathematical system. In the other you follow the mathematical system a certain length, drop it, and then add the other Representatives arbitrarily, but in the interest of justice.

If you apportion the Representatives by giving 1 for every 210,500 and each major fraction, you will have a House of 358 members and give full representation to 344,474 more people than by the Hopkins bill. Does not that come nearer to giving substantial justice? No State is left with a major fraction unrepresented nor is any mathematical system violated. Why did not the majority of the committee take this method, and provide for a House of 358 members rather than of 357? Were you afraid to increase the House by one more member? Did you think he would add very much to the uproar of which you so much complain? Would he cause the Speaker much more trouble? Would he bind more tightly the rules of this House about the gentleman from Iowa? Would it not have been more just, would it not have been more scientific, if the committee had framed its bill in this way? It seems to me so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, even if I were opposed to the further increase in the membership of this House, I could not support the Hopkins bill. In my judgment this bill is not only unjust, unfair, and paradoxical, but it is also unconstitutional. The committee, in their report, state that their method was favored by Daniel Webster, and have quoted from a report made by him. It seems to me that Mr. Webster is practically against the position of this committee. They have left out three States with major fractions. Mr. Webster said that this was unconstitutional.

In this report which they quote he used this language:

> And the exact proportion of the State, being thus decimally expressed, will also show to a mathematical certainty what integral number comes nearest to such exact proportion.

Clearly stating that each State is entitled to that representation which comes nearest to this decimal fraction. He further said, as shown by the report of this committee:

> The rule adopted by the committee says out of the whole number of the Congress that number shall be apportioned to each State which comes nearest to its exact right according to its number of people.

This bill does not conform to that rule. It does not give to Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota the number of Representatives which comes nearest to the exact right of each one of these States, and therefore it is unconstitutional. Mr. Webster stated in his report the following, which is not contained in the report of this committee and which clearly explains his position:

The rule has been frequently stated. It may be clearly expressed in either of two ways. Let the rule be that the whole number of the proposed House shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, giving to each State that number of members which comes nearest to her exact mathematical part or proportion; or let the rule be that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that, in addition to the number of members resulting from such division, a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of the division.

The exact proportion of Missouri, in a general representation of 240, is 2.6—that is to say, it comes nearer to three members than to two, yet it is confined to two. But why is not Missouri entitled to that number of Representatives which comes nearest to her exact proportion? Is the Constitution fulfilled as to her while that number is withheld, and while, at the same time, in another State not only is that nearest number given, but an additional member given also? Is it an answer with which the people of Missouri ought to be satisfied when it is said that this obvious injustice is the necessary result of the process adopted by the bill? May they not say with propriety that since three is the nearest whole number to their exact right, to that number they are entitled, and the process which deprives them of it must be a wrong process?

It is true that there may be some numbers assumed for the composition of the House of Representatives to which, if the rule were applied, the result might give a member to the House more than was proposed. But it will always be easy to correct this by altering the proposed number by adding one to it or taking one from it, so that this can be considered no objection to the rule.

When the bill that made the present apportionment was before the Senate in 1891 this same matter was under discussion. That great Senator from Minnesota, a statesman and a Constitutional lawyer, respected and honored by this whole country and now gone beyond the river, in discussing this same question argued for justice rather than mathematical precision. He even held that States with larger minor fractions should be represented. To his mind justice was far more important than the carrying out of the mathematical system. He stated his opinion clearly as to what rule should be followed in the following language, to wit:

Mr. President, I hold the true rule to be (of course, keeping always within the bounds of a proper number of Representatives for an excess, and an unwieldy number can not be thought of for a moment) to consider that number which will leave, or approximately leave, the largest unrepresented fraction after everything has been taken up, absorbed, and accounted for. And the very fact that pausing at 356 leaves three great States in the position which I have indicated is, in my judgment, a sufficient, ample, and convincing reason to sacrifice the process to the constitutional end to be attained, instead of sacrificing the constitutional end to the integrity and symmetry of the process.

In discussing the constitutional matter, and no question can be made as to his authority as a constitutional lawyer, he further stated:

Otherwise stated, Mr. President, if it is constitutional to award to one State or to several States membership on account of a fractional remainder of a moiety or more of the ratio, it is unconstitutional in any instance or upon any pretext to deprive another State having such a moiety or more, but less than the favored State, for no other reason than that the process does not, to use a homely phrase, furnish enough to go around. In such a case representation is apparently apportioned according to numbers as to certain States, and is unquestionably not apportioned according to numbers as to the State that is thus deprived.

The Congress of 1872 went much further than the Burleigh bill asks this House to go, and was in harmony with the idea of Senator Davis in giving representation even to minority fractions.

Under the act of February 2, 1872, no State lost a member except the States of New Hampshire and Vermont, and in the report upon the supplemental of March, 1872, the committee said:

The recent action of Congress in increasing the size of the House to 283 in order to save 8 States from a diminution in the number of their Representatives has induced the committee to recommend a further increase of 9 members, making the whole number 292, which is believed to be the smallest number that upon an equitable and constitutional apportionment will leave each State with at least its present representation. New Hampshire and Florida each had less than a moiety fraction, but the committee stated, "the committee assigned 1 to New Hampshire and 1 to Florida, making in all a House of 292." The reason for this is that greater injustice will be done these States by not giving it the additional Representative than to the other States by giving it.

This bill became a law.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Hopkins bill. It is unfair, it is unjust, it is paradoxical, and it is unconstitutional. The Burleigh bill is fair, it is just, and it is according to the spirit of the Constitution. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRIFFITH].

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes of the time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY].

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on the subject of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], but in his explanation of his action, which action tended to degrade and humiliate the people of the South, whom I in part represent on this floor, he said apologetically in effect if not the exact words, and in extenuation of his action, and to show that he bore no malice against the South, that he had married a Southern woman and that the blood of his infant sons was at least half Southern.

Having mentioned his family himself, I may be pardoned for saying that it must have chilled the pure blue Southern blood that flowed in the veins of that portion of his family when it was known that he was the first man to rise in this House and reopen sectional strife. I venture to say that when he has had more experience with the South he will have the feeling which would stay the hand that to-day would strike down a chivalrous and a noble people; and he is not too old to live long enough to wish that the resolution he introduced should be expunged from the records of this House.

The logical end of all such agitations is negro domination in the South, which is hell on earth to the white men on the one hand or a race war on the other. It means the reinstallation of the carpetbagger; it means the reinstallation of that bastard son of an abortion that was produced by a great revolution—a despicable, loathsome, putrid agent of the demon of darkness and corruption. It means the coming of a buzzard gluttoned with carrion, the descendants of those who, thirty-five years ago, fastened their talons in the prostrate body of the South, like those pitiless birds that fed upon the vitals of Prometheus when his helpless form was chained to his rock.

Yes, it means the return of those buzzards, gluttoned with carrion, that are to-day following the calling of their diabolical daddies in Cuba, the Philippine Islands, and in Porto Rico, who exude such an odor that a mosquito shuns them. Yes, they are so mean that the yellow-fever germs die in their presence. [Laughter.] They are so loathsome that the smallpox microbes fly from them, and if a snake bites one of them it kills the snake. [Laughter.]

This is the picture that I would avoid. This is the picture that the Olmsted resolution would draw. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania believed it, I know he would withdraw the resolution. Their financial acumen consists in Rathbonizing freedmen's funds without detection, in Neelyfying negroes' wages without being caught. That is the condition of things that we must expect to find when we pass such resolutions.

As for the Shattuc resolution, it seems that neither that nor the Olmsted resolution will pass. They will not pass until the fish worm swallows the whale; not until the hare is outrun by the snail; not until Dutchmen stop drinking beer, and not until the billy goat butts from the rear. [Laughter.] My friend SHATTUC; yes, he introduced these resolutions, but I am surprised that they should come from him, because such resolutions do not come generally from a chivalrous soldier.

Usually such resolutions emanate from a man who has never heard the rattle of musketry or the shriek of shell. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] and I shot at each other from 1861 to 1865—figuratively speaking, anyhow. When an old Confederate soldier has an ounce or two of Federal lead in his body, as I have the honor to have, and when a Federal soldier has his gravity increased by an ounce or so of Confederate metal, as I assume his gravity is, then it warms their hearts to each other, and neither would degrade the other if he could. So I was surprised at the gentleman introducing this resolution, because such things are left generally to camp followers and bombproof experts.

But it seems that his resolution ran into the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and it seems that the Pennsylvania resolution ran into his, and so it was that a paroxysm of pain occurred to both, as the éclat expected by each was smashed. It reminds me of the two bicycle riders who were going along Pennsylvania avenue a short time ago. Both were cross-eyed and did not know exactly what they were going to strike. Like these two bicycle riders in this House, they came up smash against each other. One fell one way and one fell the other. The first one said, "Why the hell didn't you look where you were going?" The other one got up and said, "Why the hell didn't you go where you were looking?" [Laughter.]

I want to say to this House now that solemnly they got up here and bound themselves to give me thirty minutes, yet here I am cut off with a paltry twelve. Who can enlighten this House in twelve minutes? [Laughter.] Here, sir, I have been waiting to enlighten this body. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I was entitled to the time of a committeeman, one hour, and I called the attention of the gentleman to it who had the division of the time; but, I said, "I will only use forty minutes of it." He said, "Sir, I will guarantee you thirty minutes." When the time came I did not rest entirely on that, but I got up and told the chairman that I would object to any arrangement unless he would give me thirty minutes. He said, "You will be taken care of."

The action of that committee and the action of that gentleman who controls the time on this side and the action of Mr. HOPKINS bound this House to give the "gentleman from Virginia" thirty minutes. Now, are you going back on it? If you do, let any man rise in his place and say so. I wait for a reply. There is none. [Laughter.] Therefore I have thirty minutes. Now, having thirty minutes, I will proceed to discuss the bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, have I not the unanimous consent of the House for thirty minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request has not been submitted.

Mr. OTEY. I ask unanimous consent, then, for twenty minutes and that the time for taking the vote be extended until half past 3. This House has not heard me on this bill, and members do not know what they are missing. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until half past 3, he to have fifteen minutes of the time. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the conditions are such that I shall be compelled to object. When the arrangement was made the time was equally divided, and my understanding was that the gentleman stated that the other side would give him thirty minutes.

Mr. OTEY. No, sir; you told me that I should have it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the special haste about getting a vote on this bill to-day?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OTEY. When framing any law due regard should be paid to the paramount natural law. Legislate in violation of the natural law and you attempt a miracle. There is no power outside of the limitations of natural law.

Race prejudice or antagonism is a natural law, and as unchangeable as the law of gravitation. Its purpose was to preserve the integrity of the species by placing in the breast of every distinct creation antipathy to all the rest. Without this safeguard human races would long since have degenerated into a conglomerate race of mongrels; deteriorating till extinction would have purged the world of such monstrosities. No one knows this better than the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON]. If not so, why does a white man or woman not marry the negro?

The theory is occasionally advanced that the antagonism between the races is due to the prejudice based upon the negro's former condition of slavery. In refutation we cite the fact that all white communities entertain a deep feeling of sympathy for the negro while he resides elsewhere, but send him to his friends in sufficiently large numbers to make his presence felt and the same natural aversion and discrimination soon develop. The former free States of the Union worked themselves into a state of fine frenzy on account of the wrongs committed upon their brother in ebony in the former slave States. We sent him to them.

The more we send the less we hear of Southern atrocities, and, strange to say, there is occasionally wafted to us intimations of race riots and lynchings north of Mason and Dixon's line. Have the morals of our former mentors become more lax since the time when their publicists and editors wasted their ink and exposed their ignorance? Or, does a fellow-feeling make us wondrous kind?

Is there no solution of the problem consistent with political equality and absolute justice? None whatever.

Justice itself is merely relative. It can exist between equals. It can exist among homogeneous people. Among unequals—among heterogeneous people—it never has and, in the very nature of things, it never will obtain. It can exist among lions, but between lions and lambs, never. If justice were absolute, lions must of necessity perish. Open his ponderous jaws and find the strong teeth which God has made expressly to chew lamb's flesh! When the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals shall have overcome this difficulty, men may hope to settle the race question along sentimental lines—not sooner. So much for the negro.

These thoughts on the negro are from the pen, in the main, of one who has studied the negro question, and it was after I heard the gentleman from North Carolina, and after the introduction of the Crumpacker bill, that they occurred to me peculiarly appropriate.

Now, as to the bill under discussion.

Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Lincoln uttered those striking words, we have been wont to repeat that ours is a "Government by the people, of the people, and for the people," and any casual observer, without considering the details of the matter, would at least infer that the people of this great and free nation had more to do directly with the administration of affairs of government than the people of any other enlightened country on the globe.

It is a notable fact, however, that of the hundreds of thousands of officials who do administer the functions of government in this great Republic, the only single one for whom the people can directly vote is their Representative in the House of Representatives—their member of Congress.

He may, indeed must, delegate to another all right of which he may be possessed to vote for President and Vice-President, but he has no voice as to who shall hold the powerful positions in the Cabinet, none as to who shall be the Chief Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, or United States judges of circuit or district courts; ambassadors, ministers, or consuls abroad; Senators of the United States, collectors, customs officers, marshals, postal and other minor officials—not even indirectly a voice as to who shall be a fourth-class postmaster, except he has the right of petition, which is accorded criminals.

It seems strange that such conditions should exist in our Republic, and this Hopkins bill—I call it Hop bill for short—proposes to further curtail the rights and abridge the power conceded the people without any good and sufficient reason why this wrong should be inflicted. Answers to such an inquiry come—

First. Expense. I was not a little surprised, coming from the source reported—this side of the Chamber—that the question of expense had been raised, that the addition proposed in the substitute bill would largely increase the burdens of the taxpayer. I would pass this by without comment except for the very narrowness of the contention.

The increase of 29 members under the Burleigh bill is an increase of eight-tenths of 1 per cent of the membership, and would entail the monumental burden of two-tenths of 1 cent per capita of the constituencies of this country, and I hardly think such "straining at a nickle gnat and swallowing a $2,000,000 camel" worthy of further notice. Like a narrow-necked bottle, the less there is in it the more fuss it makes in getting it out.

To my Democratic friend I would say that—

Second. It is urged that 357, provided for in the Hopkins bill, will leave the electoral college practically as it now stands, while 386, as in the substitute bill, will give the Republicans a net gain of 10 over that which now obtains. This may have a tendency to make some of them favor the Hopkins bill. It is clear that both suggestions assume that such States as New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Indiana, West Virginia, Kansas, South Dakota, and perhaps others are to remain forever, or at least ten years, Republican.

If this be so, then Democrats are no worse off with 387 than with 357; for as the electoral college now stands, what hope can Democracy have with the above States, or even half of them, Republican?

It is, however, wonderfully strange that the Republican leaders in this House have been unable to perceive this great advantage to be gained under the 386, or substitute bill. If 386 is to give their party an irrevocable deed to the electoral votes of certain States that will give them a permanent gain of 10, does anyone for a moment suppose that they would be so blind as not to see, so deaf as not to hear?

No one accuses them of any want of political sagacity and of that unselfish devotion to abstractions that would make them forgetful of practical politics. They are not so steeped in the wealth of patriotism as to permit their party fealty to be ruthlessly ravished. They know the difference between a bone and a banquet.

Third. It is contended that this Chamber is too small to admit of 386 membership. Can it be possible that statesmen fail to recognize that a new life begins with every second, and with it new and greater responsibilities; and must it be said that men of broad minds propose to measure these increasing and momentous responsibilities so as to make them conform to the number of square feet in a room?

It is not the size of the human body that measures the soul within; it may be domiciled in the frame of a giant and yet be so small as to rattle in a mustard seed; and yet the big soul and broad mind may be crowded in the body of a pigmy and still possess the divine fire of Him in whose image it was created.

You forget that the cramped space and damp-stained walls of the attic are sacred to the memory of noble names, and, as I remember to have read, that Haydn grew up in one; Addison and Goldsmith plied their pens in such lofty abodes; Dickens was no stranger to them; Hans Andersen dreamed his fancies beneath their sloping roofs, and Burns, Hogarth, and Watt made garrets nurseries of genius. They counted not on square feet.

Fourth. We are told that the loss of representation is not hurtful and is nothing uncommon. We are referred to the fact that Massachusetts once had 20 members of Congress and was cut down to 10, that Virginia had 23 and was abridged to 9, and that the plan suggested by a majority (of one) in the committee has the sanction of sixty years ago. But I may be permitted to remark that the past is gone from us forever. It is "gathered and garnered."

It is the glamour of the past that makes antiquated beings prate so much of the days when they were young, and it is the mirror of long ago that reflects the images of the impossible and impracticable. The world is pictured as getting worse and worse since it was created and as a most delightful abode when it was thrown open to the public. I shall expect to hear the venerable chairman of the Census Committee yet proclaim that sixty years ago the moon was like a drunkard, always full, and, like a diamond, shone brightly three hundred and sixty-five nights in the year. However, it should be remembered that in every apportionment made since 1793 increased representation has been accorded by this

House, and we are not even following precedent, and the Hopkins bill has not the sanction even of sixty years, as claimed.

But the past belongs to us no more, and we are not now moving in the plane of threescore years ago. If so, let us discard the advances made in steam, heat, light, and electricity, and resume the stagecoach and rowboat, the sickle and wooden plow; destroy the locomotive and steamship, the reaper and binder and the cotton gin, the telegraph and telephone, and forget that we produced a Franklin, Fulton, and Eli Whitney, a McCormick and Morse, Edison and Bell, a Maury, Peabody, and Goodyear, with scores of others who together formed the most brilliant galaxy of the nineteenth century. Sixty years ago, indeed! Ever since Adam's sixty-first birthday the cry has been, "Give us back the good old days of sixty years ago."

Common sense is our best guide, and in these times of great progress there should be no retrograde movement, out of respect for the loose-robed fathers of the past, who lived in "sun-kissed tents amid lowing herds, while the earth was not yet laden with trouble and wrong," and before there was a free people. No valid or substantial reason has been given or can be adduced for forcing the loss of a single Representative on any State, and this sixty years cry has less of force in it than any attempted. If there was good cause for 10 Representatives ten years ago, there is more cogent reason for it now.

Where it so happens that a State has so increased in population as to warrant an increase in representation, the substitute bill accords it, and no injustice can be done them by not reducing representation in a State whose population has not decreased.

We profess to be nearer the people, and to be the most liberal to them (and as I said in the outset, a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people), and when we find that empires, kingdoms, and monarchies give more liberal representation than we do, it is in order to inquire what can justify such abridgment of the people's rights as is provided for in the Hopkins bill.

Glancing at the tables which I read, it is seen that every one of the great powers of Europe gives more liberal representation than we do. Every one of them is more densely populated than we are. Every district has a smaller area than our districts have, thus rendering the labors of a representative in a marked degree less burdensome and easier to be performed.

These tables show that under the substitute bill our ratio will be 60,000 more than the largest in Europe; under the Hopkins bill our ratio will be 76,000 more than the largest in Europe; under the substitute bill our ratio will be 153,000 more than the smallest in Europe; under the Hopkins bill our ratio will be 167,000 more than the smallest in Europe.

The chairman says that 395 is the only number that will do equal and exact justice to all. Now, if this be so, why not make it 395? Who will be hurt by it? Talk of the House becoming a mob because of increasing it 38! Will he accept an amendment to this effect?

And then all this scientific figuring! Everybody knows that it is proven with mathematical exactness by figures, that the asymptotes of the hyperbola gets nearer and nearer it constantly, and yet never reaches it, which in practice is absurd.

The chairman says those States that lose are the ones making all the opposition to the Hopkins bill. Well, how about those who gain under the fermenting influence of the Hopkins bill—for short, the Hop bill.

It is well known that members have more than they can now efficiently attend to. If we had a membership that would justify each member being on only one committee, who doubts that the work before committees would be greatly expedited. Then, too, why should not Congress meet on the 4th of March—the day their pay begins—and attend to public business, and not wait till December and have a short session, when nothing beyond appropriation bills can be attended to.

This table shows the States affected by the apportionment bills, the figures opposite each showing the present voting strength in the House:

This country may be likened to a great corporation having been organized for certain specific purposes, with 15,000,000 stockholders. Unlike most corporations, it is a pauper, except that by the vote of the stockholders it may collect money out of their pockets for said purposes, and it has no right to acquire money in any other way. In order that these stockholders may have an eye to their own weal, they periodically assemble and a president, vice-president, and board of directors are selected, who in turn select the officials to administer the affairs of the corporation. It has a constitution and laws limiting the powers of officials. So every four years we elect a President and Vice-President, and every two years a board of directors (which we call the House of Representatives), and this board, together with a select board (which we call the Senate), constitute the board of managers.

Each stockholder (or voter) holds exactly the same amount of stock, and it is a criminal offense for him to sell, transfer, or in any way to part with it. He has the same power in selecting the board of directors as any other stockholder, but this power is circumscribed and confined to the selection of only one member of the board. That is to say, he can vote for only one, but still he has an equal power with others in determining as to how much money must be taken out of his pockets to maintain the corporation and as to how it is to be expended.

The man that sweeps the streets has as much legal power therefore as a Rockefeller, and the hod carrier can neutralize the power of a Vanderbilt in this respect. Why, then, should he be shorn of an atom of this one single right? If it was as it is in Great Britain, he would have three and one-half fold more; as in France, threefold; as in Germany, one and one-half fold.

But it seems that such concessions are not to be given him, but on the contrary, "that which he hath" is to be taken away. The

Hopkins bill, read between the lines, in effect says of the individual stockholder or voter:

First. He has too many privileges now and he must be deprived in part of that modicum of the distributive fluid called power now possessed by him, it being to subtle for his limited intelligence.

Second. That in fact he does not understand its use, and since this has been made manifest the less he has of it the better.

Third. That the personal comfort of members of Congress must be provided for before his rights are considered, and the sanctity of this august Chamber must not be encroached upon by any larger numbers.

Fourth. That the present dimensions and the fragrance of the foul air pervading it are to be maintained, notwithstanding artificial means have to be resorted to in order to pump the pure air of heaven into its recesses, in the midst of which not a ray of the sun ever penetrates.

Fifth. That business will be impeded if we accord him the full measure of his rights (but what business the deponent sayeth not).

Sixth. His burdens of taxation will be increased if any other bill or the substitute bill prevails (I may reiterate 2 mills per head of constituencies), forgetting that no taxation can be imposed without the consent of Representatives, and the more liberal the representation the more guarded the immunity from wrong.

Seventh. That complaint will proceed only from denizens of attics, tenements, and those who follow the plow, wield the pick, ax, hammer, and saw—the emblems of poverty, but the implements of the acquisition of wealth—and it does not matter if they are abridged in power.

Eighth. Paraphrasing Vanderbilt, it virtually says, the "common people be damned;" who cares whether or not to them "life be worth living?"

Carry out such a theory as the Hop bill provides to its legitimate end, and to what will it come? Not only to the abridgment of power now lodged in the people, but to a centralization of power in the hands of the few, which was the dream of Hamilton, and which found in Jefferson its most formidable antagonist and implacable foe.

It will not be long when its influence will percolate into State autonomy and the power of governors and legislatures therein will be a memory. Why have any at all? Why not a privy council, county lieutenants, a few messengers, which together would perform governmental functions?

I know, of course, that Congress has nothing to do with such things now, but go on diminishing the power placed in the hands of the people (who form the bone and sinew of the land) when it is our duty to enlarge and extend it, and how long will it be when we will have a "government only of the few, by the few, for the few."

The unit of local self-government in the North, especially in New England, is the rural township, governed directly by the voters who assemble annually (or oftener, if necessary) and legislate on local affairs, levy taxes, make appropriations, appoint and instruct selectmen, clerks, school committees, etc. Townships are grouped to form counties, each with a commissioner and other paid officials.

In the South counties are generally the units, though subdivided for educational and other specific purposes, and certain officials have additional functions, such as the care of the poor, superintendence of schools, etc.

In the Middle and Western States the two systems are blended, the public lands in the West having been divided into townships 6 miles square.

Why keep up all this expensive machinery?

We now have the advantage of the full distribution of power in State governments, which is the sheet anchor of our liberties. Home rule and local self-government in the States are assured as long as this distribution of power is not diminished. The Hopkins bill does not, and under the Constitution can not, deal directly with this subject except so far as the State is interested in its representation in Congress. It strikes a blow at this, and if the insidious want of principle which underlies this bill is to become all-pervading, how long will it be when county and State lines will be obliterated and any apportionment no longer necessary?

God forbid that this day will ever come; but the more you abridge the power of the people, which the Hop bill does, the nearer such a day approaches. Let us hope that, like the comet that has passed its perihelion, it is off on its hyperbolic orbit, continually approaching its aphelion, but like the asymptote which never reaches the curve, though constantly nearing it, it may follow its example.

But coming back to a comparison with other nations, I observe that in Great Britain one-sixth of her population vote; with us one-fifth of ours perform this function. Now, if we should adopt the ratio which Great Britain accords her people with one-sixth voting population, we would have to-day 1,246 Representatives in this body, where we have only 357 under our ratio.

But if Great Britain should adopt our ratio with our one-fifth voting population, she would have 192 in the House of Commons, where she now has 670.

Each representative in Great Britain covers an area averaging 178 square miles, while each member of Congress covers an area in his representative capacity (not including Alaska) averaging 7,600 square miles.

Area and density of population seem to be entirely lost sight of in the Hop bill. A Representative of the people in the United States not only represents more people than the representative of any other enlightened nation on earth, but he has to get over more square miles to attend to the wants of his people, and hence has to undergo more labor to properly represent them than any other.

He represents now 112,000 more people than a representative in Great Britain does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 147,000 more; he represents now 107,000 more people than a representative in France does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 142,000 more; he represents now 110,000 more people than a representative in Italy does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 145,000 more; he represents now 132,000 more people than a representative in Hungary does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 167,000 more; he represents now 99,000 more people than a representative in Prussia does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 134,000 more; he represents now 132,000 more people than a representative in Spain does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 167,000 more; he represents now 121,000 more people than a representative in Austria does, and under the Hop bill he will represent 156,000 more; he represents now 41,000 more people than a representative in the German Empire does (I mean in the popular branch of the legislative body of the Empire), and under the Hop bill he will represent 76,000 more.

As to density of population, compare only the two great English-speaking nations. England and Wales have 495 of the 670 members of the House of Commons. The urban population (1890) was 70 per cent, while in the United States it was 29 per cent (census of 1890 is used, as England's census of 1900 is not before me). In England and Wales 22 per cent lived in cities of 250,000 and upward; 9 per cent lived in cities of 100,000 up to 250,000; 9.6 per cent lived in cities of 50,000 up to 100,000; 12.6 per cent lived in cities of 20,000 up to 50,000; 8.3 per cent lived in cities of 10,000 up to 20,000; 8.9 per cent lived in cities of 3,000 up to 10,000.

That is to say, the rural population in England and Wales is 30 per cent and the urban population is 70 per cent, while in the United States the rural population is 71 per cent and the urban population is 29 per cent—conditions almost exactly reversed. In England and Wales there are 358 towns of over 10,000 population; in the United States there are 448 towns of over 8,000 population.

Thirty-two large towns in England and Wales, not including London, have a population of 7,588,536, with an area of 543 square miles—13,900 people per square mile—with 123 members in the House of Commons. New York, with about the same population now, with an area of 48,000 square miles—126 people per square mile—has 34 members in this House.

I do not hesitate to affirm that 34 Representatives could more effectively attend to the wants of 7,500,000 people in an area of 543 square miles than 123 could in an area of 48,000 square miles, yet the conditions are reversed and will be accentuated under the Hopkins bill.

Examine, if you please, some grouping of States, and compare results with England and Wales.

No. 1.—Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Virginia: Population, 7,900,000; area, 242,000 square miles; population per square mile, 32; number of representatives, 45.

England and Wales: Population, 7,900,000; area, 58,000 square miles; population per square mile, 497; number of representatives, 123—over three-fourths less area, 465 more people per square mile, 78 more representatives.

Take the most densely populated portion of the United States:

No. 2.—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania: Population, 17,000,000; area, 162,000 square miles; population per square mile, 107; number of representatives, 100.

Great Britain, with 38,000,000 population, 120,000 square miles, and 313 persons per square mile—a little over twice the population of group 2, one-third of the area, and three-fold more people per square mile—has over six times the number of representatives.

I am aware that it will be contended that area has nothing to do with the merits of the measure, and that density of population is equally as foreign to the subject. Theoretically, this may be so, but Sir Isaac Newton said that when theory comes in contact with fact theory had to go. And so we find it here.

It is a fact, the more Representatives allotted to an area of territory, the more efficiently will the people be served. And in large areas sparsely settled, it is still more essential to have sufficient representation, that they may be served promptly; and the Hopkins bill overlooks the fact that we are servants, and not rulers, and that it is the serving business, and not the ruling business, in which we are engaged.

I am not unmindful of the fact that our Constitution and laws provide for an apportionment by population, but there is nothing in either that forbids, in fact the spirit of both encourages, giving to large areas of rural territory the largest and most efficient representation practicable in this body. Large rural population scattered over extensive areas of territory ought to have the largest measure of distributive power, that power which is the safety valve of the Republic, and though much gas is let off by reason of it, yet as long as it remains in the hands of the many instead of the few, the people can not complain and will not suffer.

Do you wish to increase the ratio of representation because you think too much power now resides in 173,000 people or in 194,000? Do you not know that the ratio proposed in the Hop bill curtails and abridges this power just one-fifth? If the voter is a whole man now, this bill proposes to make him a four-fifth man. What will he say? He will see that his ratio is raised 35,000, and yet less than twice 35,000 in monarchial England adds one whole representative to the House of Commons.

In other words, the Hop bill allots for every 208,000 people 1 Representative. Yet for every 208,000 people Great Britain has 3.4 representatives; France, 3.1; Italy, 3.3; Hungary, 5; Prussia, 2.8; Austria, 4; Spain, 5; German Empire, 1.7.

The individual voter will wonder why you are so jealous of your own comfort, why so much solicitude about the size of the Chamber, why so much anxiety about the electoral college, why so suddenly struck with a fit of economy, why so much reverence for three-score years of the past and so little for the present.

Talk about delay in business! If we had as many members as now constitute the House of Commons—yes, 670—aye, if we had a hundred million people and a ratio of 100,000, which would make this House 1,000 in membership, and would apply improved methods, such as Americans apply in their own business, we could and would do more business than we now do with 354, and still be closer to the people. As paradoxical as it may appear and yet as everyone admits, there is more and more to do every year, and yet it is proposed to have fewer people to do it.

I do not hesitate to say that the application of electrical devices in this House, such as would enable us to vote "aye" and "no" rapidly, as called for in a resolution introduced by me, would save much time and kill the last lingering nerve of filibustering.

Again, enlarging this Chamber would not only facilitate business, but it would give good and pure ventilation and tend to stop the mortality of members, largely due to the foul air we breathe and to the volume of carbonic acid gas which pours down upon us from 12 m. to 5 p. m., and from the poisonous effects of which there is no escape except to the cloakroom or the grave.

These things ought to be considered, and if time is given I am sure remedial measures will be taken which will afford relief, when provision will no doubt be made for a much larger number of Representatives than even the substitute bill calls for.

The larger the number of Representatives the more thoroughly will the people be served. I do not blame the President and the Administration for the abuse of power placed in the hands of Rathbone and Neely; but had this been in a Congressional district and a Congressman been called on by the President to indorse them it might have been different. You do not find such cases where the Representative of the people is called on. He has to keep watch over his district, and seldom it happens that fraud and embezzlement and robbery is the outcome of the recommendation of a member of Congress.

How melancholy one of you would feel had you been Rathboned by one of your constituents, honored by your confidence. But here are Rathbone and Neely, responsible to no member for good behavior. Did not they swim?

Such doings are not apt to occur under the watchful eye of a member of Congress. He is very careful as to whom he recommends for places that are subject to be embezzled and looted.

Personally I want to enter my appeal for Virginia. I appeal for no increase, but for no decrease.

Beginning with the First Census, in 1790, with 13 States and 4 Territories, Virginia lead with 747,610 population; in 1800, with 16 States and 4 Territories, Virginia lead with 880,200; in 1810, with 17 States and 7 Territories, Virginia lead with 974,600; in 1820, with 23 States and 3 Territories, New York lead with 1,372,111; in 1830, with 24 States and 3 Territories, New York lead with 1,918,698; in 1840, with 26 States and 3 Territories, New York lead with 2,428,921; in 1850, with 30 States and 5 Territories, New York lead with 3,097,394; in 1860, with 33 States and 8 Territories, New York lead with 3,880,735; in 1870, with 37 States and 9 Territories, New York lead with 4,382,759; in 1880, with 38 States and 8 Territories, New York lead with 5,082,871; in 1890, with 44 States and 4 Territories, New York lead with 5,997,853; in 1900, with 45 States and 3 Territories, New York lead with 7,268,012.

This old Commonwealth donated to the nation the great Northwest Territory, embracing what is now the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, parts of Michigan, and Wisconsin.

It was in Virginia that the first representative assembly was convened, in 1618. It consisted of the council and a body of representatives, two from each of the eleven plantations into which the colony was divided. This assembly imposed taxes, considered petitions, and passed laws for the government of the colony. Thus Virginia led, and though nominally dependent on the King and company, had an independent government of its own at this early period.

A State with such a record, I submit, should not at this late day be cut down in its representation in the Congress of the United States. Then, again, she was despoiled of her territory, violently cut in twain, without authority of law, yet by ravages of war—and I might add that she would have kept pace with the general increase in population but for the fact that her good people were so much "kneaded" to furnish the "leaven" for the successful rising of the loaves of progress in other States that it has constantly drained her, and but for Virginians many States would not have the representative force they have to-day.

Indeed, they pride themselves on Virginia ancestry. But for Virginians many now occupying seats on this floor would not be here. Not infrequently, when introduced to a new member as from Virginia, I am at once told that his ancestors were Virginians and he is proud of it.

Again I appeal to this House for the substitute bill because of the injustice done sparsely settled rural or agricultural districts by the Hopkins bill. There are nearly twice as many people engaged in farming as in manufacturing. The area occupied by the one is of necessity much larger than that of the other. It is with much more ease and facility, with much less labor, that the Representative of the densely populated and smaller area can administer to the wants of his people than when conditions are reversed.

It is an easy job for a member of Congress in an area of 6 miles square, or 36 square miles, to serve 173,000 people as compared with one who has to serve 173,000 in an area of 20,000 square miles. The one in a compact city like New York, Chicago, or Philadelphia can be in touch with his constituents by 'phone, telegraph, mail, or in person at any hour, but the other, with an area of 7,600 square miles (the average in the United States, not including Alaska) has to be almost a "perpetual motion." The Hop bill increases all the difficulties now encountered, adds prominence to the obstacles which should be removed.

In Virginia it not only adds to the number of people to be served, but in each district it increases the area 445 square miles.

The Hop bill overlooks the great advance and progress making in mining, lumber, coal, iron, forestry, manufactures, fisheries, commerce, shipping and navigation, internal commerce, foreign trade, rivers and harbors, utilization of the billion acres of public lands, of our insular possessions, of science, literature, and art, and ignores the power of taxation and appropriations, all of which must of necessity be of great interest to the people, and all of which demand the very largest degree of representation for them possible.

You need constant accretions to your stock of wisdom, and any curtailment of this is to be greatly deplored. One member of this House for every 100,000 people would be 760 members, and would add greatly to the wisdom under this mighty Dome.

Rules can and will be made, room can and will be provided, more business can and will be done, and done more expeditiously and satisfactorily, just as necessity demands. It is well known that under 357 membership this House has done more business, and done it more effectively and thoroughly, than under any former apportionment giving a less number.

Stephenson astonished England when he stated that his engine would draw a train at the rate of 10 miles an hour. Now a train running at 60 and 70 miles per hour passes by unobserved.

There are always mossbacks, and from all such "good Lord deliver us." They believe in the past, for they live in it. Retrogression to them means progress. When they look back over the long road traversed in the past they see no rugged rocks, no dangerous quags, no sharp stones, no shattered columns, no broken shafts, but they live on the memory of the fragrance of "the roses left by the wayside, and the gentle tendrils waving in the wind." The present is full of briers and the future to them is to be a crumbling ruin.

I protest against them and their creed. I protest against any retrograde movement. To deprive a State of a single Representative is to go backward. Let us keep abreast with the steady march of progress which in this nation has been without a parallel, and in which in the future it must be without a peer.

You who view with alarm the continued distribution of power among the people, stop and ask yourselves what will they think of it when they realize what you have done. They are not fools, and they know that if 100,000 of them may choose a Representative to Congress, and you change it so that 200,000 may do so, it will not take much time for them to see that you have voluntarily abridged their power just one-half. To them you will have to render your account.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I complain of no member on account of his position on this question. I accord to everyone that rectitude of purpose and sincerity of action which I claim for myself, and, while self-interest must govern us all in a greater or less degree, I concede nothing less than patriotic motive to each and every member of this body.

It may be that I am zealous in opposition to the Hop bill because my State will lose a member under its operation. It may be that others are ardently in favor of it because their States gain members.

No man coming into this House without some knowledge of its membership, approximately, could guess within 100 of the number of which it is constituted, and it is well known that on an aye-and-no vote a record of 250 is seldom disclosed.

One class, then, think 357 just enough, but I know of none such whose State loses a Representative by the 208,000 ratio.

Another class will favor 357 because the ratio reached has the sanction of the dust of sixty years ago, but most of them hail from a Commonwealth that either does not lose or does gain.

Still another class favor 357 because this ratio leaves the electoral college practically in its present shape, though causing loss to some States—while assuming that politics will be forever stationary and the electoral college unchangeable—but no loss of representation to them.

Then 357 is urged by others because in their States no rearrangement of districts will disturb present incumbents. Some are for 357 because the Chamber is too small, and say nothing about loss or gain. But of such I have heard of none that lose. Some oppose any increase in membership that will not give their State increased representation. Some oppose it because, although their State loses no representation, still, while getting no increase, its relative power or influence is diminished as compared with the whole without considering the party strength.

I might add other classes, and file reasons as varied as the ratios are numerous. I assume, however, that the purpose of all classes is to better the condition of their respective States.

I do not, however, believe that patriots exist only when advantage is to be gained, and hence I appeal to Republicans and to Democrats alike to lay aside party feelings and banish the electoral college ghost and to ask themselves what they would do if no question of party advantage had been raised. Then ask themselves, is there really anything in that question of party advantage to be gained to the Republicans in the apportionment which gives 386 members.

I want to ask members of that committee who oppose 386, or the substitute bill, would they not have voted for 386 except for the fact that the electoral college bugbear was thrust before them?

Then I appeal to you to vote—

First, that no State shall lose a Representative;

Second, that every State shall have the full benefit of the majority fraction—remembering that the functions of Congress are growing in importance every day, and that there should be greater representation in proportion as great interests are enlarging hour by hour.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the fundamental idea of popular government is the distribution of power. From the battle of Hastings our ancestors have been fighting to maintain this principle and wrest power from the hands of the few and lodge it in the hands of the many; and it was consummated in our national fabric and sealed with the blood of patriots when, in 1781, the proud crest of England went down in disgrace and despair at Yorktown, and the flag of freedom was hoisted, never to be lowered.

To maintain the principles thus established and to continue and to enlarge this distributive power among the people should be the aim of the Republic and of the popular branch of Congress, at least. Of nothing should the people be so jealous as the encroachment on, or abridgment of, this great boon. No right or privilege possessed by them should be watched so incessantly, preserved so carefully, and guarded so aggressively as the one right in the fullest measure to select the only official for whom, under the Constitution, they can vote, viz, the man to represent them in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America. [Loud applause.]

I desire to append the striking letter of Mr. Frank Abial Flower, of Washington, D. C. I invite especial attention to it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1901.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Yours of November 6 was duly received, but not until now has it been possible to reply to your inquiries concerning the apportionment. You ask:

1. "Is there any substantial warrant for reducing the representation from any State because such State disfranchises some of its citizens for other reasons than rebellion or crime?"

2. "Is there a mathematical and legal way of so apportioning Representatives among the States as to do exact and equal justice to each and all?"

First. If there were such warrant, Congress did not authorize or require the Director of the Census to gather facts on which to base such a reduction. You can not tell where or how to begin.

Second. Yes; there are several; but I lost many a night's sleep before finding the controlling principle which underlies all of them, although it is simple enough now that it has been found.

Heretofore the process by which the apportionments have been computed have not produced results that were legally or mathematically correct, or politically just, because they included the necessity of assigning (or rejecting) an entire Representative for a bare major fraction of the accepted ratio, which gave to some States over and to other States under representation.

The possibilities for injustice under this practice are very great, and can never be eliminated. For instance, North and South Dakota may have within one of equal populations. The former, with a minor fraction of 100,000 above the ratio, would receive 1 Representative, while the latter, with a major fraction of 100,001 above the ratio, would receive 2 Representatives.

This additional person in South Dakota may have been a child born a day or an hour prior to taking the enumeration. Thus the representation of a State would be doubled, and also doubled over the representation of a sister State by the numerical value of a single one-day-old babe.

What is worse, if this child should die on the day following the enumeration, thus reducing the population of the two States to an exact equality, South Dakota nevertheless would continue for ten years to enjoy double the representation of North Dakota.

This is an extreme but not impossible case, and vividly illustrates apportionment features which have occurred frequently in actual practice, and must continue under this process forever.

However, the fact that these irritating forms of injustice have never been eliminated, nor even ameliorated, does not mean that it is impossible to give to each State its mathematically exact strength in the House of Representatives and the electoral college, but that a way of doing so has not been devised or adopted.

A fundamental error has been committed hitherto in assuming that representation means physical persons or integers.

If such were really the case, a one-armed or one-legged person might not be considered a complete or lawful Representative.

Representation does not mean a certain number any more than it means a certain weight of persons.

It means simply choosing and putting forward a vehicle or instrument for giving, and which can and does give adequate expression and effect to the popular will or ascertained voting strength of a given community.

One person as well as 4 or 40 or 400 persons can represent a community in a representative body, if he be properly clothed with authority to do so.

This fact has received actual illustration times without number by popular conventions giving one vote to two persons, or two votes to three persons, or by instructing or authorizing one person to cast the vote of an entire county or State delegation, or of an entire convention.

If this old and undisputed principle be applied in creating and defining the strength of the House of Representatives and the electoral college, all over and under representation—the basic element of injustice and irritation—at once disappears, except in the case of States having populations less than the unit or ratio of apportionment.

There are three or more ways in which this principle may be applied. For the first illustration let it be applied as follows:

1. Assume 1 vote in the House of Representatives for every 205,500 persons.
2. Divide the representative population of each State by this number.
3. The result will be 8.898 votes for Alabama, 12.245 votes for Indiana, 14.835 votes for Texas, 20.231 votes for Ohio, 35.344 votes for New York, and so on.
4. These votes, which represent with mathematical exactness the proportionate strength of each State to the aggregate strength of all the States (Wyoming, Idaho, Nevada, and Delaware excepted), will come into Congress in the form of as many persons as there are votes and fractions of votes assigned to the several States.
5. Thus Alabama will send 9 persons, 8 with full votes and 1 with 0.898 of a vote; Texas will send 15 persons, 14 with full votes and 1 with 0.835 of a vote; Ohio will send 21 persons, 20 with full votes and 1 with 0.231 of a vote, and so on through the list (Wyoming, Idaho, Nevada, and Delaware excepted), the complete result being as follows, apportioned by the ratio of 205,500, according to the Twelfth Census:

No State loses a person, but several lose a percentage of voting strength.

In order to carry an apportionment formulated as above stated into actual practice, Alabama will elect 8 physical Representatives, 1 each from eight compact districts of uniform population and contiguous territory and 1 to represent the fraction from the State at large; Texas will elect 14 physical Representatives, one each from as many lawful districts and one at large, and so on appropriately through the entire list of States, except that Wyoming, Idaho, Delaware, and Nevada, which, respectively, do not contain sufficient population to equal the ratio unit, but which, by Article I, sec. 2, of the Constitution, are nevertheless entitled to one full Representative each, must elect their Representatives at large.

The number 205,500 is taken as the unit of apportionment because it gives to the lowest States the same number of personal Representatives that they now enjoy.

To accomplish this result the voting strength of the House is enlarged to about 395, and the personal membership to 387, both, however, readjusted and equalized within the limits of the law, political justice, and mathematical correctness, except as to Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming.

Even this method can not give absolutely just results so long as States are admitted into the Union with populations less than the accepted unit of apportionment, and the Constitution declares that each State shall have at least one Representative.

But this form of malrepresentation also, fundamental as it is, may be eliminated by using, as section 2 of Article I of the Constitution permits, 30,000 as the unit of representation.

This plan involves assigning to each physical integer or representative person the power and right to give expression and effect in Congress to a certain fixed representative value or strength in the form of votes.

In order to permit each State to retain in Congress its present number of representative persons, each such person may be empowered to cast 6.8 votes or units of representation, or such fraction thereof as any State remainder or the population of any of the four small States may determine.

To make the actual apportionment as thus indicated, divide the representative population of each of the forty-five States by 30,000, which will give the number of votes in the House and the electoral college to which such State is entitled; then divide each number or quotient thus found by 6.8, and that will give the smallest number of persons required to represent these votes and fractions of votes in the House.

The result will be in each State a certain number of persons empowered to cast 6.8 representative votes each, and a person entitled to cast the fractional remainder for that State.

To find the value in representative votes of these remainders (in other words, the number of votes the fractional Representatives are entitled to cast), multiply each, if they be in decimal form, by 6.8. Each full Representative is given the power to cast 6.8 votes, because that is a number which does not reduce the present number of members from any State. Any other number may be taken without destroying the accuracy of the process, leaving the House at its present size or otherwise.

Such an apportionment results as follows:

State.	Abstract voting strength.	Persons.	Number in proposed House.	Number in present House.	Gain in persons.	Voting strength of fractional Representatives.

Representatives so apportioned will be elected as stated hereinbefore—those clothed with 6.8 votes by compact and equal districts, and the one in each State having less than 6.8 votes (representing the fraction, or, respectively, the States of Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming) will be elected by the State at large.

The person so elected by any State at large will enjoy all the privileges, honors, power, and pay of other Representatives, but his vote in Congress will be fractional only, as heretofore indicated. This places the small States of Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming on an exact equality with all the other States.

If deemed advisable, the fractional vote or votes to which any State may be entitled may be divided equally among the entire number of Representatives assigned to that State, thus avoiding the election of one person at large, except in the case of Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming, which can not avoid electing their Representatives on the general State ticket.

I have had no time to make an actual apportionment on that basis, but perhaps will be able to do so later, if you desire.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK ABIAL FLOWER.

Hon. JOHN J. JENKINS, M. C.

P. S.—A larger number than 6.8 (say 6.85) will reduce the size of the House without cutting down the present personal representation from any State; it would merely wipe out such small fractions as those attached to New Hampshire and Oregon. The process is perfect for any conceivable size at which the House of Representatives may be fixed.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the majority and minority are very nearly equally divided numerically and politically. Each report a plan for our adoption.

We should carefully analyze each of these plans and adopt the one or the other or reject both and formulate our own plans, as our best judgment shall dictate.

Let us first see what the majority presents. It makes the present number, 357, the telling virtue of its plan, and makes everything, whether it carries justice or injustice in its train, yield to the idea that the number of Representatives shall not be increased beyond 357.

Secondly, it proposes taking the 357 Representatives now provided for here and to so redistribute them as to take certain members from States where small gains in population have been made and hand them over to such States as have made larger increases.

In this distribution 1 is taken from Maine, though its population increased 33,300, and is given to Illinois, where the increase is greater; 1 is taken from Indiana, though it increased its population 324,058, and is consigned to Louisiana, because it had increased more rapidly; 1 is taken from Kansas, though this State gained 43,399, and is given to Minnesota, that made a greater increase; it takes 1 from Nebraska, though it gained 9,629, and turns it over to New Jersey, that has made a greater gain; takes 1 from Ohio, though it gained 485,229—enough to give it 2 additional members under present ratio—and gives it to New York, which has made a greater gain; takes 1 from South Carolina, that has increased 189,167, and gives it to West Virginia, because the latter had a greater increase; takes 1 from Virginia, which has gained 198,204, and gives it to Texas, because it has gained more; takes 1 from Kentucky, though it has gained 288,539—more than enough to give it an additional member under present ratio—and hands it over to Texas, which has made a greater gain.

What is the result? You take from each of eight of the noted States of this Union an existing Representative, based on the apportionment of ten years ago, notwithstanding some of these States have increased enough in population to entitle them to two new Representatives under the present apportionment, and all have made a vigorous, healthy growth. You unnecessarily humiliate the people of these proud and honored States, disorganize their Congressional districts, and greatly diminish the efficiency of their representation in Congress, while the evolution of government here is constantly augmenting national powers and duties. What do we gain by this innovation, this humiliation and irreparable injury to eight great States in the Union?

We are told that we save the expense of additional members. Such a reply is specious, insipid. There is not a month that some questionable appropriation does not pass here involving more than the increase proposed by the minority without a whisper of protest from any member of this committee. Such a plea should be beneath the serious consideration of the American people. But, say they, an increase of 29 members will unduly crowd the House. The Architect's plan completely refutes that charge. They say the House will be unwieldy.

Every leading deliberative legislative branch of the people in Europe refutes this. It would take a century to make this as large as the House of Commons at the pace set by the minority. But we are told that these large representative bodies are only common to monarchies. The large representative bodies have always been yielded on the clamoring demands of the masses of the people, and such acquisitions celebrated as bulwarks of the people's rights and liberties. Those desiring to block legislation for the masses of the people always concentrate their efforts on the smaller legislative branch as the easier to convince and handle.

Now, let us examine the premises of the minority. The ratio of 173,901 was fixed for each Representative in 1891. Our population was then 62,622,250. The present population is 74,565,906; an increase of 11,943,656, and the minority have added to the number of persons for each Representative 20,274 more than the ratio upon which we were elected, and this leaves the Representatives of each State intact, which is in fair harmony with the general increase in population. What is the result of the minority plan?

It increases the House but 29 members and leaves the delegations in each State intact, does not humiliate the people of any State or injure it in the eyes of the public, and includes all majority fractions and has no "paradoxes." The minority follows the old precedents and tries to correct all inequalities so far as possible, while the majority has centered all of its force around the single, immaterial point, "do not increase the membership of the House."

It is willing to arbitrarily strip such time-honored States as Maine, Virginia, Indiana, Ohio, Nebraska, Kansas, Kentucky, and South Carolina of a part of their present representation and give them to the more lucky States, and thereby humiliate the people of these great States and do them irreparable and material injury.

It would have been most difficult for the members of this committee to have devised a plan by which they might strike a more fatal blow to the good name and credit of these States than to advertise to the world that they have gone into decay and ruin.

The general run of the people will never learn that it was a mere shortsighted policy and that these States have no blight. Take the flings of the chairman at the State of Nebraska, and his intimation that Nebraska had been the subject of a Populist blight, as evidenced by this loss of a part of her representation, and what must be expected of the busy investors and home seekers?

The mere fact that such insinuation was utterly false and malicious does not make it less damaging. They will never learn that the majority took 173,901, the ratio for the last Congress, and added 34,957, equaling 208,868, as the ratio for this, which deprived each of these 8 States of 1 Representative and advertised to the investing and home-seeking world that they are deteriorating. Now, the minority adds 20,274 to the present ratio of 173,901, making the minority ratio of 194,182, an increase in harmony with the general increase of population, and saves all existing Representatives, and does not ignominiously advertise any State as stagnant or deteriorating.

Now, there is a third innovation in this majority report, and that is this: That mathematicians, from the time the system was adopted, have admitted that it now and then developed an atrocity which they have elected to call a "paradox."

In 1881 Mr. Seaton, the chief clerk, said, in making these calculations:

> I met with the so-called Alabama paradox, where Alabama was allotted 8 out of a total of 299, receiving but 7 when the total became 300.

But, be it said, to the credit of the committee and of Congress, they never failed to hurry in the bill a correction of all the palpable defects developed in the faults of the system; but the Alabama paradox, the Maine paradox, and all other paradoxes shrink into insignificance when the shadow of the Colorado "paradox" appears.

And I want everyone here to look this squarely in the face. Colorado gains 1 on every set of figures from a House of 350 to one of 400, or in 49 times it comes in and goes out on the majority bill. Now, I have no kind of suspicion that any member of the committee was influenced in fixing this number at 357 because it caught Colorado at this point. Colorado came in at all other places, whether you increased or decreased the number in the House, but the glaring fault in the system developed at that point, a missing cog was found, or the machine slipped a cog at this point.

This is a double-headed "paradox" of Colorado.

In the Alabama case the paradox consisted in giving Alabama 8 with a total House of 299 and only giving it 7 with a House of 300, when from a true mathematical or scientific standpoint her number, if changed at all on an increasing ratio, must have increased. The paradox is complicated in the Colorado case by a falling out of line both ways, or to say that from 350 up to 357 Colorado gains 1, loses at 357, gains at 358, and holds it continually up to 400; or, in these figures, on both sides of 357 Colorado gains 49 times and falls out 1, showing that this system is not scientific, as this freak presents a mathematical impossibility.

There are inequalities developing on every side of this "hocus-pocus" system.

Take, for instance, the State of North Dakota, that has a majority fraction for which it gets no member. North Dakota, under this bill, gets a member for 314,454 persons, while New York, the largest State in the Union, gets 35 members on a ratio of 207,522, less than the real ratio, because she gets one on a majority fraction, and it takes 131,735 persons more for North Dakota to get a member, than it does for New York to get each of its 35 members.

Florida has a majority fraction for which it gets no member and gets its two members on a population each of 264,271, while New York gets each of her 35 members on a ratio of 207,522, so it takes 137,120 more persons for each member of this little State than it does for each of New York's 35 members.

The State of Colorado under the majority bill gets one member for a population of 268,557, while New York pays only 207,522 for each of her members, or it takes in Colorado 61,035½ persons more for each of her two members of Congress than it costs New York for each of her 35 members, and so it works as between the small and the large States, always to the advantage of the large States after the ratio of population is reached in the State.

This comes in this wise.

Colorado has but 2 members and has a majority fraction of 121,367, which must be divided between 2 members of Congress, making each of her members stand a ratio of 268,557½ persons in lieu of 208,868, but if New York had this majority fraction of 121,367, instead of Colorado, instead of having to divide this up between 2 members, as Colorado must, it divides it among its 35 members, making each of them cost New York 212,335 instead of 268,557½, as it costs Colorado, per member, or giving Colorado, for illustration, and New York each the same majority fraction that Colorado now has, 121,367, and each of Colorado's members will cost her 56,520½ persons more than New York's members will cost that great State, and to as far as possible equalize this great advantage of the large States over the smaller ones, every Congress heretofore has taken care of the major fractions, and sometimes of minor fractions where the injustice was too flagrant, and I have no doubt that Congress will take care of the Colorado "paradox" as it did with the Alabama "paradox," and with the major fractions of North Dakota and Florida as it has always done heretofore; and I now propose and will offer at the proper time an amendment making the number 560 instead of 357, taking in Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota.

This fault, in my judgment, is constitutional. The unit used for determining the apportionment should have been based on well-defined and limited Congressional districts, instead of making the States a unit. With the States as a unit, and adding the fractions of all the Congressional districts, give the largest State a decided percentage over all smaller States, as above shown, after they pass the ratio adopted.

I now offer an amendment, which I propose to offer before the committee, and I ask now that it be considered as pending, permitting Colorado, North Dakota, and Florida each to have an additional member.

> In line 5, page 1, strike out the word "fifty-seven" and insert "sixty," and whenever "fifty-seven" occurs thereafter strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "sixty" in its place. In line 8, page 1, strike out the word "two," after the words "Colorado" and "Florida," and insert "three" after "Colorado" and after "Florida;" and after the words "North Dakota," in line 5, page 2, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, American citizens of the twentieth century are ruled by a system of government transmitted, through generations, from the early fathers. A century of time has wrought but few changes in that Constitution which was the ideal of the patriots, whose ambition was the equality and enfranchisement of man—a government by the people for the people.

The century closed has witnessed our institutions of government made the models for the republics of the world.

The strength of our Government is that it dwells in the hearts of the people. Thus was it transmitted unimpaired to us, and we owe a like duty to posterity.

The measure under discussion is most important. It binds Congress and legislatures for ten years, and, fixing an apportionment, as it does, concerns fundamentally our system of government.

Believing that the Hopkins measure restricts too much the rights of just representation that should be lodged in the people, I shall favor an enlargement of the membership of the House to 386, as proposed by the Burleigh bill, and, convinced of its justness, I shall state the grounds of my belief.

Keeping in mind the intent of the framers of our Constitution, and that which has moved statesmen from that time, the investment of the greatest power in the people, we find that the bill before us runs counter to that theory in that it limits the membership of the House of Representatives to 357, thus enlarging the number of people represented by each member here from 173,901, as fixed by the last apportionment, to 208,868, an increase of people to be represented by each member, in round numbers, of 35,000. In other words, the 357 members fixed ten years ago as the proper representative body for 62,622,250 of population shall stand representative for 74,565,868, the present population; and not only this, but represent the increase of population for ten years to come, which can not be less than 14,000,000 more.

If the Hopkins bill becomes a law, at the end of its life each member of the House, then, will be representing 248,000 people.

The House of Representatives, as originally designed, was to be the popular branch of the American Congress, and the members were to be directly and intimately responsible to their constituents. This was provided by the term and the mode of election.

The constitutional ratio was one member to not less than 30,000 people.

However strong our plan of government, weaknesses may be found in the quality of popular representation and responsibility. If popular sentiment counts for proof, these defects are not found in a too close responsibility to the people of two of its branches.

The President is not accountable directly to the people for four years after his first election, and not at all after his second election. Through that branch the people are unable to change a policy for four years, however unjust it may appear to them.

The Supreme Court judges are appointed for life by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They cease to be members of the court only on removal, by impeachment, by resignation, and by death. Surely there is an immunity from popular sentiment in this branch of the Government. Many people have made free to criticise the Supreme Court for some decisions on constitutional questions, charging that they were out of line with popular legal opinion and public sentiment.

The Senate, removed so far from the people by the method of selection and term of service, can not be said to be in close touch with them; and in multiplied instances the method of choosing Senators has led to the turning aside of the public will, the result of sinister means and fraudulent and corrupt practice, made easy by their selection by a comparatively small legislative body.

Many States have been absolutely disfranchised from tie-ups and deadlocks, the natural and legitimate fruit of practices made easy by the mode that removes so far from the people the selection of their Senators.

With these conditions it can not be claimed that the Senate is as truly representative of the people or responsible to them as some body should be to insure their safety and protection.

So long as the Senate is not elected by direct vote of the people, so long must the House of Representatives be a large and truly representative body.

The reform of electing the Senators by the people must come from sentiment created through State legislatures and the House of Representatives.

Other reforms known to members, and which I shall not take the time to enumerate, must be accomplished through a body like this, strongly representative of the masses.

So long as the House is large and representative, so long will it respond to the sentiment of the people, and the people can be trusted.

We have heard it much said in late years that the House was not a representative body. Mr. Speaker, we have a code of rules here that seems to have given rise to that general impression.

This popular impression—and I am not concerned in disputing its correctness—this evil in the House, does not come from an enlarged number of Representatives, but rather from a concentration of power in the hands of a limited number of the members and the invocation of the rules to enforce policies. The abuse rather lies in the drastic enforcement of the rules through the Rules Committee than in the rules themselves. Happily the rules are seldom invoked, save to enforce political policies.

It may, with some show of reason, be claimed that political policies, sanctioned by public sentiment, should be enforced by drastic rules. However that may be, it will be found that such action will only be positively dangerous, when the personal responsibility of members to their constituents is lessened to such an extent that motives other than patriotic ones will move the rank and file of the House to follow leaders into such policies.

It will be found that servility in following leadership will be lessened as the electorate to which the member is responsible is smaller, thus enabling him to draw his inspiration from the hearts of his people. Motives are difficult to ascribe; but it will not be out of line with human nature to find that those whose constituents have kept them long here, and who have won places on committee and leadership in Congress, and who perform a major part of its work, are willing to limit the responsibility of members and represent a larger constituency, thus enlarging their relative power under the Hopkins bill. I may lie under a charge of arraigning class against class in the House, but it is a condition with us, and we might as well confront it.

Sir, the very strength of the House of Representatives, as an institution of popular government, is its nearness to the people.

While the great leaders here, who have won their places by long service, are entitled to the best consideration and the respect of members of less service, yet the great body of this House who are not leaders represent the great body of the country. Though in management and leadership they may not rank with the others, yet they are here to pass upon great public questions, and their votes are potent, sacred, and enduring.

The great leaders and managers are mighty in debate, powerful in management, and potent in committee, but when it comes to registering votes on public questions the humblest member rises to a level with the greatest, and votes are the recorded sentiments of constituencies.

After all, the sentiment of the people is voiced in roll calls and on votes. In the very nature of things a large number of members can not speak fully on many public questions.

We become specialists tn legislation, at least so far as offering in debate views on questions.

Under our system of government and mode of selecting members of Congress it will be found that our constituents judge and measure a member by his record and votes on questions before the House. We are the custodians of the sentiments of our districts and recorders of their will—a jury selected from the neighborhood, delegated by the people to represent them truly.

We should know our people and they should have the opportunity of knowing us; and then, from personal knowledge of and acquaintance with their member, they would feel free to inform, instruct, and criticise.

This, it will be seen, can more readily be done, in consonance with our form of government, by smaller constituencies, which will bring the member in closer touch with his people.

It has been said that in years gone by, special interests have elected members, who thus owing their seats, became special pleaders for a special cause, to the detriment of the public good.

Not having proof, I will not assert, but knowing of methods used to control nominations and elections, knowing the forces that can be exerted by special interests, such powers will have the surest means to operate when the membership of the House is less.

A larger membership insures more independence against class interest and class power, and gives a House which wealth and influence can not so easily corrupt.

In this age of concentration of power and elements and influence, the safest method of preserving the House of Representatives, as a body representative of the people, is not secured by an increase of the number to be represented.

The power of individual members, dissociated from all considerations save the power of voting, is not to be underestimated. Members of independence and feelings of responsibility can call for record votes, and many instances can be recalled when not only the votes of individuals but the vote of the House sitting in committee has been changed when the light of public scrutiny, through a roll call, is turned on the votes of members. Smaller constituencies and its concomitant, closer responsibility, secures such results.

We are here not to receive honor and distinction, save as it comes from a true representation of the sentiments of our districts.

As there is wisdom in a multitude of counsellors, so is it true that Representatives are better able to serve the people by being in close touch with them.

Napoleon subjected easily the House of Ancients, a comparatively small body of representatives. The House of Deputies in France stood out till the end against his tyranny; remained in session to oppose him till he drove them out of the doors and the windows at the point of the bayonet. Later, Napoleon, taught by the lesson of experience, cut down the number of Deputies and controlled them.

A large Parliament withstood the tyranny of Charles the First and drove him to execution. A rump Parliament of a hundred yielded to a Cromwell.

The words "compact and contiguous" in the bill are designed to enable the Representative to more readily get acquainted with his people, but it will not be found possible, within the scope of a lifetime, to get on any degree of intimate terms with 209,000 people.

We all know the manifold duties incumbent upon members in the varied interests of the country. We know the requisitions that are made upon us by constituents, under the custom long in vogue, and properly made, requiring a vast amount of time and industry to perform. We all know the faithfulness with which members perform these duties, know their value to constituents, and we know how much our constituents appreciate these services.

In fact, there are Departments where it is absolutely necessary that members intercede to secure prompt returns to the wants of our people. This is a service that there is no immediate prospect will be dispensed with.

Yet, with this condition staring the majority of the committee in the face, they say, in effect, that 14,000,000 more people in the ten years to come shall be added to the districts of the present membership.

In their report some stress is laid upon the reapportionment of 1842, after the Sixth Census, when a reduction was made in the number of Representatives. That result grew out of the peculiar condition at that time, and it had no precedent for its justification at the time, and it has never been considered as a precedent from that time till now.

The reduction in the apportionment of 1842 was the result of the political contest and abnormal conditions of 1840. The political and industrial conditions preceding the election and the apportionment were not calculated to mold a safe policy. The country had been enormously burdened by high taxation, and the accumulated surplus had been made the object of greed and extravagance. There had been an excessive inflation of the currency by the issue of an irredeemable paper currency. The recoil from such conditions produced ruin and industrial distress on every hand.

The alleged reform, then, which is followed now, grew out of these unnatural conditions, and the precedent created is not safe.

With the exception of 1842, in the apportionment of members the rule always has obtained to increase the number of members to keep pace with the increase of population.

The majority of the committee has departed from the practically universal rule and adopts a new rule and policy, the direct effect of which is the lessening of the representative character of the House.

The Constitution fixed the ratio at 1 member to 30,000 people. This gave a membership of 65. The First Census increased it to 105; the Second to 141; the Third to 181; the Fourth to 213; the Fifth to 240. The Sixth Census reduced it to 223. The Seventh increased it to 233; the Eighth to 241; the Ninth to 283; the Tenth to 325; the Eleventh to 356.

As shedding some light upon the subject it will be interesting to note the views taken by the Committee on the Census of ten years ago, as shown in their report and the debates on the bill for the apportionment of members then. Mr. Durnell, chairman of the committee, said:

> The committee discovered in the House a decided unwillingness, almost universally entertained and very largely expressed, to consent to any reduction of the present number of members assigned to any State. This bill, therefore, provides that no State shall suffer a decrease in its present representation. This was the object sought in the apportionment which has been made.

He had previously said:

> The committee finally decided to accept and adopt 356. I shall be asked why this number rather than any other was selected. I reply that it was selected because it was found to be the number first reached between 332 and 375 that would secure each State its present representation.

These remarks reflected the general tenor of the report.

Again he said:

> There were those on the committee who desired to retain the present number, but it was found that that could not be used without contravening what seemed the universal sentiment of the House, because very many States would lose 1 from their present representation. There were 10 States that would lose 1 member each. Letting these facts guide us, it was found that there was no other number that we could reasonably make use of than 356, and no other ratio than 173,901.

These views, it seems to me, are just, and the sentiments are appropriate here, and should bear greater weight than the unprecedented and false standard of 1842.

The report presented adopts a ratio that causes a number of large and progressive States of the Union to lose a member of Congress, and by the same operation other large and progressive States fail to secure a new member, to which they seem to be entitled under former rules of apportionment. And now let us see what reasons are urged by the majority of the committee for this departure from precedent for this increase in the number to be represented.

We look over the report vainly for reasons other than that "economy and dispatch of business" require it. Economy is a word much used and much abused in public affairs. It is used in the latter sense in the report. Such a policy is false economy. Where is the economy? Twenty-nine additional members will draw in salaries $145,000; outside of salaries the additional cost will be $46,000; in all, $191,000 to be appropriated, in addition to the usual estimated annual appropriation of $743,000,000 for 1902. Put the figures together and you can not tell them apart, the amount in comparison is so inconsequential, and I have given all the additional expense sought to be saved in the name of economy and at the expense of the people. The theory of economy falls hopelessly to the ground.

The next reason urged is "dispatch of business." Mr. Speaker, in the light of the record of this House this session, with the record for the dispatch of business under the rules in the last decade, aside from the solemn form in which this point is asserted in this report it would not seem to have been seriously made.

When I reflect upon the thorough knowledge that the majority of the committee had of the operation of the Reed rules and see this report, I am tempted to say as Cicero did—he said he could not see how two fortune tellers could look each other in the face without laughing, and I can not see how two members of that committee, asserting "that business can not be dispatched," etc., I can not see how they can look each other in the face without laughing.

In great party questions no difficulty has ever been experienced by the party leaders in enforcing party polices through the invocation of the rules, and no procrastination or filibustering tactics have ever won against the determined efforts on the part of the party leaders opposing it.

This session, when business of the greatest magnitude has been taken care of with celerity without invoking the rules, shows that no expedient that lessens the power of the people should be resorted to "for the dispatch of business."

The States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire have assemblies larger than this. There may be others. They seem to be thoroughly representative.

As instances of representative bodies much larger in numbers than the House of Representatives may be cited the German Reichstag, 397; the French Chamber of Deputies, 584; the House of Commons, 670; the Hungarian House, 453; the Italian Parliament of Deputies, 508; the Austrian Reichsrath, 425.

Certainly no one can be found who would let weigh, in this great public question, the mechanical rearrangement of this Hall. If it were possible to adopt some plan that would secure the recasting and remodeling of this Hall, it ought to secure the support of every member on acoustic and hygienic grounds.

Both were unknown or unconsulted by the architect that designed it, and troubles in comfort and health have resulted. A change that will get us nearer the light of heaven, and the outside breath of life will lessen the confusion and add to our lives, not to speak of the other points that will tend to make the House a deliberative body.

Then, again, these desks can be dispensed with and be supplemented with a few tables in the rear, that will secure much comfort and relief. Desks are not known in many of the other great assemblies of the world, notably the English and the French.

If we desire to save more time adopt a scheme of government for the District of Columbia that will enable its people to be American citizens, with the right to vote, and thus save at least one-tenth of our time for legislation which is wasted when we sit as a common council for the District of Columbia.

Another reform for time saving is easy. Save the time consumed in roll calls by adopting the electric method of voting. There is no impediment to its adoption.

It is a reflection on the inventive genius of the age that we must listen for a half hour to the humdrum of roll calls. Invention has made it possible to distinguish the voice of your friend as he speaks to you across the continent. At the deft touch of fingers and to the music of the clicking machine, it adds up figures by the thousands with a speed and accuracy beyond the dexterity or mentality of man. These are instances of improvement to lead us on, not to mention the dream of the destroyers, who hope to sail from continent to continent, under the ocean, and destroy fleets and navies on the other shore. This improvement in the House would be but a small dot in the great plot of the improvements of the age. There are hundreds of such, and they show we languish here.

If we must continue the old system, it will be found that 29 members in addition will add but little to the waste of time. It is not easy to do equal and exact justice to all in framing an apportionment bill, but a careful study of the Burleigh measure convinces me that as near as human foresight can it adopts a correct standard and conclusions. If we look for injustice in the Hopkins bill, we can readily find it outside of the feature that deprives States of Representatives.

Under the provisions of the Constitution a small State has an advantage and a greater relative power.

The Hopkins bill fixes the ratio at 1 for 208,868, yet the little State of Nevada, that would never have been heard of if there had not been a volcanic upheavel, and, I might add, if it had not been for the distinguished gentleman who so ably represents it upon this floor [Mr. NEWLANDS], the people there sleep quietly, on the slopes, in their hillside homes, deeply conscious of their worth in that one member is given them for 42,335 people. Wyoming gets a member with 92,531 population, yet Oklahoma, to which the world rushed a few years ago, and toward which the center of population is fast advancing—Oklahoma, with its 398,245 people, is not represented by a member of Congress, however well she is represented as a Territory by her distinguished Delegate [Mr. FLYNN], who sheds a grace here by his presence and his learning. Oklahoma should in justice and by equality have her statehood, then our friend would shed a luster at the other end of the Capitol, in the Senate.

Under the Hopkins bill Vermont, with a population of 343,641, gets two members, while North Dakota, with a population of 319,000, gets but one. According to the North Dakota standard, Vermont gets a member for 24,000 people, and according to the Oklahoma standard she ought to have 53,000 more people and get no member. These flagrant inequalities, so far as possible, the Burleigh bill corrects.

If the position I take is correct, from the point of statesmanship, no refutation of it comes from entering the field of politics or political advantage.

The causes that lead to political results are so multitudinous, so versatile, and withal so inestimable that no standard based upon present or past conditions political can weigh a feather in what should be done in the future.

Many States fixed in politics in the past give no assurance of the future on either side in the panoramic change of political questions and shades and turns of political principles.

Especially is this so when the margin of change in the electoral college is, as it must needs be in the present estimates, so exceedingly small. Again, such a basis being predicated upon a group of States assumed to be certain, vacillating as some of them must be, and built, as it must be, upon unsubstantial assumptions, wholly leaves out of consideration States classed as doubtful, any one of which, changing its political status, would break the whole slate upon which calculation was made.

States and groups of States have been known to change on questions. The money question can be cited as an instance. The Chinese question had such effect. The Japanese and oriental labor may have a like effect, not to mention an inundation of Filipino fellow-citizens to our country.

These thoughts are thrown out only for the consideration of those who figure political advantage or political expediency in this legislation, based upon the vote in the electoral college or on the Representatives in this House, if any such there be.

Mr. Speaker, every time you increase the number to be represented by each member then you lessen, so far, full representation, and this should be done only when exigency and urgency demand.

I favor the Burleigh minority bill of apportionment, because the more I dwell upon it the more I am convinced that it represents truer Republicanism, truer Democracy than the Hopkins bill. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said here touching the supposed "unfortunate condition of the negro in the South." I exceedingly regret that I have not time to give some of the interesting history of his condition. But I submit that those who profess to be his friends in the North, East, and West deny him the same things that we in the South deny him. This indisputable fact you blindly overlook in your mad advocacy of negro equality in all things.

Why, gentlemen, do you Republicans ever even appoint—not elect, but appoint—him on the supreme bench of your States to administer to you the law? Do you Republicans ever put him on the Supreme Bench of the United States to administer the law to you and each of you and your people? No, indeed! But you would have him do so in the South, and the laws so framed as to force him on us. Do you ever nominate him for President or Vice-President when you well know the Republican party has repeatedly elected Republican Presidents since the civil war? Do you ever put him in the Cabinet? You dare not, but you could "appoint" him there, and he would receive you in due course socially and officially. You do not, but you would have him given unlimited suffrage in the South that such association might grow.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, when the South, as she has a right to do under the law of the land, undertakes to protect herself from these very things, and legally, we have it flaunted in our faces that we oppress and outrage the negro.

Mr. Speaker, suffrage is a State right, a State gift, and must be so exercised as to maintain a republican form of government, and the State to do so regulates her gift and has the right under the Federal Constitution to do so, giving the same legal right or legal opportunity to exercise this suffrage to the black as she does the white.

Treat in the law both alike and the court is satisfied. This was done in Mississippi, and the Supreme Court so held in the Williams Case (170 U. S. Reports), and Justice Brewer so held in a Kansas case found in 7 Kansas State Reports, and so Paine on Elections declares the law.

In the Williams case Justice McKenna for the whole court said:

> Besides, the operation of the Constitution and laws is not limited by their language or effect to any one race. They reach weak and vicious white men as well as weak and vicious black men, and whatever is sinister in their intention, if anything, can be prevented by both races by the exertion of that duty which voluntarily pays taxes and refrains from crime. (Williams vs. Mississippi, 170 U. S., 222.)

In holding the fourteenth amendment did not apply, the court, in concluding its opinion, said:

> This comment (on fourteenth amendment) is not applicable to the constitution of Mississippi and its statutes. They do not on their face discriminate between races, and it has not been shown that their actual administration was evil, only that evil was made possible under them. (170 U. S. Report, p. 223.)

The fourteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage. (43 Cal., 43, Valkenburg vs. Brown; 21 Wall., 162, Minor vs. Hoppersett, 10 Am. and Enc., p. 572.)

Mr. Payne says (Payne on Elections, pp. 55, 56):

> The fifteenth amendment guaranteed the right of suffrage on equal terms with the white and colored races.
>
> * * * * * * *
> It imposes but a single restriction upon the exclusive power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters, namely, that all qualifications shall be the same for the white and colored races.

Here we find that Mississippi gives to the white and black an equal chance to vote and compels neither to vote or not vote; and this high court—a Republican court—so declares; and yet the South is condemned as disfranchising the negro by this law.

Again, it is fashioned after the constitutions of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Wyoming—all Republican States. Massachusetts requires that to vote the person shall not only "read" her constitution, but read it "in English." So in Connecticut, so in Wyoming, and the courts uphold the law. A case in point is to be found in 50 Pacific Reporter.

The Australian ballot system has been held constitutional in the following (if not more) States: California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wyoming, Wisconsin, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Rhode Island, and cases cited are 58 Pa. Stat., 338; 60 Pa. Stat., 54; 105 Pa. Stat., 488; 136 Pa. Stat., 459; 10 Am. and Enc. Law, 579 and 586.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a single State in this Union, and I believe not a single Territory, that has not so legislated in every instance as to place the executive, judicial, and legislative power of this country alone in the hands of educated white officials. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to-day raises his voice here as the champion and friend of the colored man and says this is all wrong, and yet out of the thousands and thousands of negroes in Ohio, and, indeed, in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts and Kansas, is there ever elected a single negro to the Congress, as governor, or judge in those States, or any State?

Nay, more, do these communities ever place any colored man in any single solitary case in a position where he will be called upon to administer the law—not where he shall administer a mere clerkship, but where it shall be his duty to administer the supreme law of the land, State or Federal? Not one. "And they never will," said the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] here Saturday. And yet the South must be condemned because she says we will legally do the same thing in self-defense.

Mr. Speaker, I am the friend of the colored man. I have been such since my childhood. I shall so continue. I hold in my pocket a letter from a man whom, I dare say, cast his vote against me, a negro from my own city, thanking me for getting him a position as a servant, where he can work in the day and go to school at night and finish his education, there being no night colored schools in Nashville, though blessed with many and of the very best schools in the land. But I shall never agree to put the executive, judicial, or legislative branches of this Government in the hands of the negro, and in doing this South we know it is best for him and best for us, and you in the East, North, and West have not and will not do more than this for the negro nor less for yourselves, and your past record proves this.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago in my own city there assembled a crowd of negro ministers to celebrate emancipation day; and here is the language of the chief orator of that occasion—a distinguished negro divine:

> The South is the place for us to achieve our success. In the North almost every door is shut against the negro; in the South he is offered free and unlimited activity in all trades. Your emancipation means that we shall contend for our rights in the labor market of the South.

In proof of this the negro remains South, regardless of everything enticing, so to speak, elsewhere.

I hold in my hand a Pittsburg Republican paper stating that last week negro delegates from a Southern labor union had been excluded, because negroes, from a white labor union of Pittsburg, Pa., the State of the gentleman [Mr. OLMSTED] who would have Congress to investigate Southern outrages on negro suffrage South. In the South the unions deny this equality. Do you ever send him on the high missions to Europe, where, as a great minister, he would receive you and your people and mine? No, no, indeed!

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has two minutes, the remaining time on that side.

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOPKINS obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has fifty-two minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, during the time allotted to me in this debate I shall undertake to answer some of the objections which have been made by gentlemen of the committee and other gentlemen who have addressed the House to the bill reported by the committee. I shall endeavor to show that this bill is a fairer bill to the people of this country than the one submitted by the minority.

It is unnecessary for me to call the attention of the members of the House to the fact that in this legislation we are performing a great constitutional duty. It is unnecessary, too, I think, for me to say that this legislation that is to be enacted here to-day is to affect the popular representation of 45 States for the next ten years. Hence it is important to the interest of every man's constituency that passion and prejudice should be laid aside; that members of this House should look at the facts and the figures presented here to-day and determine this question, as I have intimated before, not from a sectional standpoint, not from the standpoint of any State or district, but from the standpoint of "the greatest good to the greatest number."

The gentleman from Virginia who has just addressed the House [Mr. JONES] made some reflection upon the chairman of this committee because this bill is reported by a gentleman who happens to represent a district of Illinois, a part of the territory that once belonged to the grand old State of Virginia. Why, Mr. Speaker, nothing is farther from my mind than to do an injustice to any State or any locality or any member on this floor. As chairman of the committee I have sought to examine the great questions involved here and by the light presented to me to bring the best results for the consideration of this House.

Mr. OTEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY]?

Mr. OTEY. I simply want to ask a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield.

Mr. OTEY. Does not the gentleman think it is doing Virginia a great injustice not to give her Representatives the time that it was agreed they might occupy on this bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, Mr. Speaker, after listening to the gentleman I confess that if he had occupied all the time it would have been much better for the country.

Mr. OTEY. That does not answer my question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not take up any further time with that matter. I desire, however, to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that this is not the first time that that great State has had her representation on this floor reduced. The time was, as I now remember, under the Fifth Census when Virginia had a representation of 23 members. To-day she has a representation of 10. But it is unnecessary to say to the gentleman, or any intelligent man either on this floor or in the country, that Virginia's relative influence in the councils of the country is as great to-day as it was when she had 23 members on this floor.

Virginia's position on all of the great questions is felt as powerfully as it would be if her representation on a proper ratio should be increased to 30 members. Now, as I said, Mr. Speaker, I have no apologies to make for the bill that has been offered here by the majority of the Committee on the Census. We have followed the beaten path that has been marked out for us by the great men who have preceded us in the councils of the nation. We have taken the course that has been adopted by the best scientists and the great statisticians of the country in order to present a bill that had the least inequalities and the least injustice to any of the States in the great Republic.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that with a confederated Republic such as we have, composed of 45 independent sovereign States, those States having different geographical boundaries and different numbers in population, it is utterly impossible for us to arrive at any ratio that will mete out exact and equal justice to every member of the Federal Republic. The most that we can do is to approximate to what is just and fair.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Just one word. It has not yet been stated in this debate, and I should like to know if the gentleman can state, what ratio of representation leaves the smallest sum of minority fractions unrepresented.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will get to that later. I think the majority bill does that. I will call the gentleman's attention to that.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. The gentleman does not catch my inquiry. There must be some divisor, some ratio of representation, which provides for all majority fractions and leaves mathematically the smallest possible sum of minorities unrepresented. That divisor has not yet been given in this debate.

Mr. LONG. I should like to inquire, by permission of the gentleman from Illinois, do you mean under these two bills or under any bill?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I mean under any bill or under any system of computation. It is a simple question: What divisor applied to population leaves the smallest possible sum of minority fractions unrepresented?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I have not the figures on that basis from the Director of the Census. I have some figures which I will insert in my remarks, running them out by percentages and showing that, in accordance with the population of the various States, the majority bill is more nearly fair to all of the States that are represented in the Federal Republic than the minority; but I have not the figures to meet the inquiry of my colleague.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen have made complaint because these fractions differ when they are applied to the different States and when the ratio is changed. But anybody who is familiar with mathematics at all ought to understand that with a different divisor you get a different quotient every time, and it is because in running through these figures from 350 to 400 we take a different divisor 50 different times that produces the paradoxes that have been spoken of by the gentleman from Colorado this afternoon.

But, now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is not a sectional bill. It is not a bill to protect the interests of one State at the expense of another. It is a bill to provide for the best interests of the nation itself. In the discussion that has been had here so far it has been made apparent, I think, to the members of the House that the chairman of the Committee on the Census and those members who have been with him in reporting this majority bill have had no selfish and no State interest to subserve.

I charge, Mr. Speaker, that the minority bill has not been prepared on these national grounds. I charge that the minority bill has been prepared to protect the interests of certain individual States regardless of the interest of others, and that was clearly and forcibly demonstrated by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] when he showed that it benefited 15 States and injured 24 different States. To show to you, Mr. Speaker, how this is I desire to call to the attention of the members of the House the names of the gentlemen who signed the minority report.

The first member is Mr. BURLEIGH, the author of the minority bill. He is to take care of Maine, which, under the majority bill, loses a member. The next member is Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut, one of the ablest and best men upon this floor, but he has been led astray by the fact that under the Burleigh bill an additional member is given to the State of Connecticut that is denied to her under the majority bill.

The next is Mr. HEATWOLE of Minnesota, who has joined in this report, and his State is given an additional member over what it is given in the majority bill. The next two members are Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. GRIFFITH, of Indiana, both men protesting that Indiana, under the majority bill, shall not lose a member, as is provided in that bill. The next is Mr. WILSON of South Carolina, who stands equally in the position of the other gentlemen.

The members of the minority undertake to say here to the members of this House that they have prepared the Burleigh bill so as to take care of major fractions. That matter has been discussed by me in a limited way prior to this time, but I desire again to call the attention of the members of this House to some features of that bill wherein it is distinct and separate from the bill presented by the majority of the committee.

We have stated that we predicate our bill upon a report that is given to us by the Director of the Census, where we take the arbitrary number of 357 to constitute the membership of this House, and then using that as a divisor, taking the constitutional population of the United States, we get a ratio to determine the membership in this House from the several States.

By doing that we apply that ratio, obtained as already stated, to every State in the Union and then take care of the fractions in the manner that I have indicated, giving to the State with the largest fraction a member, and so on, until these additional members are allotted. My learned friend here at my right [Mr. LONG] in his argument yesterday undertook to lead the House to believe that this is an invention of recent date. His idea is that the theory that all major fractions should not be provided for by a member is an invention to support the present majority bill, and that it was advocated in some way first by Mr. Walker, Superintendent of the Ninth and Tenth censuses. I contended the other day and I contend now that that principle was first announced by Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts, in 1832, and that it has been followed since the census of 1840.

Now, gentlemen, why do I make that statement? I acknowledged at the start that in 1832, under the bill that was presented by Mr. Webster, every majority fraction was cared for, but the great contention at that time was not so much as to whether all major fractions should be cared for as it was that fractions should be represented in the apportionment of the States. Up to that time, as gentlemen well understand, the allotment had been made upon a basis where no representation whatever had been given to fractions, and the House, under the leadership of Mr. Polk, of Tennessee, prepared a bill of that character and it passed the House.

When it went to the Senate Mr. Webster, noting the inequalities and the injustice done to several States, evolved the principle of having fractions represented. When his plan was sent to the House it was rejected, but in 1840 the House adopted it, and not only adopted that, but adopted the principle of disposing of the major fractions in the manner contended for by the majority of the Committee on Census.

I call the attention of the members of this House to the report made by Mr. Everett, chairman of the Committee on the Census in 1842, wherein this principle was advocated. In it he uses this language:

The two modes—

Speaking of the different modes that had been suggested—

are as follows: The first, to ascertain the ratio by dividing the aggregate Federal numbers of the United States by the number of Representatives proposed, and to apportion them among the States by dividing the Federal numbers of each State by the ratio thus found and assigning a Representative to the highest fractions until the proposed number of Representatives are assigned.

Exactly the plan that was followed by the majority of the committee in the preparation of the bill that they present to you. He says further:

The principle was adopted by the Senate in the amendment to the apportionment bill of 1832, but was rejected by the House. On that occasion elaborate reports were made in the Senate by Mr. Webster and in the House by Mr. Polk, containing, it is believed, a full argument on both sides of the question; and, as the question in some form may again come before the House, they have been annexed to these reports.

That was in 1842. That was the principle adopted in 1850, when the men who were in control of national affairs were charged with the duty of preparing a bill, as our committee were charged. They resorted to the principle announced by Mr. Everett in his report in 1842, and they went still further than that. They insisted, as many of the members do on this floor to-day, that the House had become too large and that some provision should be made that in the increase of population the constituencies of members should be increased and the membership of the House should remain practically as it was at that time.

The membership was made 233, and if any gentleman will look at the statutes of the United States passed May 23, 1850, he will find a law fixing the representation of this House at 233 members. It was proposed to make the membership of the House permanently 233, and when the census should be taken the next succeeding ten years, and so on, that the Secretary of the Interior after the official count had been made and he had obtained the constitutional population of the United States, should make his apportionment in accordance with that law of 1850, keeping the membership of the House at 233.

I say to my fellow-members upon the floor that our bill is in accordance with the principles that are enunciated in this law that was to be the permanent guide of the members of the House. I call their attention to this proviso in that law:

Provided, That the loss in members caused by fractions remaining to the several States in the division of the population thereof shall be compensated for by assigning to so many States having the largest fractions one additional member each for its fraction as may be necessary to make the whole number of Representatives 233.

Clearly, fully, and conclusively showing that in 1850 they had recognized the principle that had been advocated in previous censuses, and that they proposed not only to keep the membership of this House down to 233 men, but they proposed to give that representation upon this floor precisely in the manner that has been proposed by the majority of the Committee upon the Census.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONG. Is not that the first time the rule was followed?

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, Mr. Speaker, I am not now speaking of that. I am speaking of the permanent statute that was placed upon the statute book by the men who had this in charge, when they proposed to fix a rule that would guide all subsequent Congresses upon that subject.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not permit the gentleman to interrupt me further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, if during any of those times a combination was made by States so that a variation had to be made, that simply shows that combinations can entirely destroy and strike down the great principle that should govern and control the action of this House.

I simply refer to this law to show that the way has been blazed for us by the great men who have preceded us on this floor, and also to the fact that they recognized then that the House, under the then membership, was growing too large for the dispatch of business with orderly procedure in the House.

Now, this bill that has been offered by the minority of the committee is, in the language of the street, what would be regarded as a "mongrel." Part of the representation in this House is based on the figures given to us by the Director of the Census, and when they have taken care of Kansas, Nebraska, Virginia, and Maine, they deliberately add the other States that they want to take into their combination, and say that the apportionment shall be 386, and then come to this House and try to make intelligent men believe that they are representing all the major fractions.

Why, Mr. Speaker, is it that they take the number 384? They take it because by using the major fraction they can take care of Connecticut and give her an additional member; they can take care of Kansas by a majority fraction and give her an additional Representative; they can take care of Maine, and, on a majority fraction, give her an additional member; they can take care of Nebraska, and they can take care of Virginia. Now, mark you, these are the States that are largely interested in the report of the minority committee, and these are the States whose members have been upon this floor denouncing the bill and report of the majority of the committee in unstinted terms.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. LONG. Did we not take care of Illinois on a majority fraction also under that computation?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, they did not take care of Illinois; and, as I showed at the opening of the debate on this question, Illinois is entitled, under the representation of 386, to 28 members. But whether they had taken care of Illinois or not, that would not have influenced me in the least.

Mr. LONG. Did we not, under the computation?

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the computation. My criticism, Mr. Speaker, is not that Illinois has not been taken care of, because I believe it is my duty as a member of this House not to try to give Illinois any political advantage over her sister States. Illinois, with her magnificent population and her representation upon this floor, can care for her interests whether that representation be 20 or 28. My contention is that these gentlemen in preparing the minority report and bill presented here have made a combination of States to secure political representation and influence in the House to which they are not entitled under a fair apportionment. If their bill be adopted, it has denied to 24 other States their share of representation.

When they say, Mr. Speaker, that they take care of the major fractions we find that while they do with a 384 membership, the moment they make that number 386 they have left the States of Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania with major fractions without giving them any representation whatever for such major fractions. If a majority fraction of 102,664 is good for Nebraska, why is not a majority fraction of 102,882 proper for the State of Michigan? If Maine is entitled to an additional member with 114,941, then I want to know why it is that New York, with a majority fraction of 115,826, is not also entitled to a member? Why not Pennsylvania, with a majority fraction of 120,515? Why not the great State of Ohio, with a majority fraction of 100,870? And the grand old Repubilcan State of Iowa, with 106,928?

And yet my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] undertook in his speech yesterday to say that they had cared for the majority fractions. When they make a membership of 386, it matters not by what process, it is the result we look to, and when we look at the result of 386 members we find they leave six great States that I have named, with major fractions, unrepresented for those major fractions. Is the State of Virginia or the State of Nebraska entitled to a Representative for a major fraction any more than any one of these States? Now, Mr. Speaker, they can not avoid the logic of this situation by simply saying they must stop somewhere.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not be interrupted now, because my time is passing too rapidly. That is the trouble, Mr. Speaker, with the bill that has been presented here by the minority of the committee. If they want to deal fairly with all of these States, why did they stop at the number 386? Why did they leave these six States out? Why did not they increase the membership? Why did not they go to 395, where no State will lose any member?

I call this to the attention of the members of the House to show that in the combination that is represented by the minority of the committee they are seeking here to gain a political advantage for the States they represent, regardless of the interests of the other States in the Republic, whereas in the bill presented by the majority the committee have taken the figures presented to us by the Director of the Census and have followed them as indicated by previous laws, and, as I have stated, given to us by all statisticians and scientists who have given any attention to this subject.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that the gentleman insists that the majority of the committee are attempting to injure some of the States. On Saturday last one of the Representatives from the State of Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] had the floor here for a couple of hours and made an address upon this subject, in which he made this charge against the majority of the committee. He said that the bill we proposed "might well be entitled an act to cripple the State of Maine in her representation on the floor of this House and incidentally to apportion Representatives in accordance with the numbers of the people elsewhere."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to state that the majority of the committee had no State and no individual in view in presenting this bill. It is true that under the majority bill Maine is entitled to only three Representatives, and, if Dame Rumor is to be credited, the seat of the gentleman who addressed the House on Saturday last is the one in danger. In making this statement he takes a modest way to tell the House and the country how dependent the State of Maine is upon him. How delightfully encouraging it must be to his colleagues of that State to know the esteem in which they are held by him.

Maine crippled! Maine, the State of Hannibal Hamlin, of William Pitt Fessenden, of James G. Blaine, of Senators HALE and FRYE, of the great Tom Reed, of the honored and loved Nelson Dingley! That great State crippled by the loss of LITTLEFIELD! Why, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's statement be true that Maine is to be crippled by this loss, then I can see much force in the prayer he uttered here when he said, "God help the State of Maine." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the State of Maine, under this bill that we propose, is as fairly and equitably dealt with as the State of Illinois or any other State mentioned in the bill. It may be her misfortune that the majority fraction is not considered, but under the system that has prevailed for years in this House relatively she loses nothing. As was stated here yesterday, it is not the number of members from any State which constitutes its power and influence in this House. I can remember when Thomas B. Reed was a member of this House, with Nelson Dingley, and that they exerted an influence upon the legislation of this country that was not equaled by the members from any other State in the Republic.

And if Maine desires to hold the high and honored position in the councils of the nation that she has in the past, she must look to the quality of the men she sends, and not the number. And what I say of the State of Maine is equally true of Illinois and of every other State. It is not the number of the men, but it is the character of the men that come here; and, as has been stated again and again, the larger the number the less responsibility there is among the members.

Lessen the membership of the House, and you will find a body in ability and deportment and in the dispatch of business that will rival the Senate of the United States. The scenes which have been enacted here to-day again and again—the Speaker attempting to get order so that the members could be heard—are a good illustration of the fact that a halt should be called in the increase of the representation on this floor.

Mr. Speaker, this question, as I have stated, is one that was considered in 1840 and in 1842 and in 1850. I find that under the Fifth Census the representation in this House was limited to 240 members. That was in 1833. In 1842 the membership was decreased; and for thirty years the membership of the House increased but 3 members. In 1833 we had but 240 members, and in 1863, 243. The population of the United States in 1830 was 12,866,020. When we had increased the number of Representatives on this floor only 3 our population had increased to 31,443,321. So that gentlemen will see that if we do not increase the membership of the House now, we are simply following the precedent that was given to us in the early days by men who had known the troubles that have been experienced by members who have been Representatives on this floor for three or four Congresses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I go on to other branches of the case I desire to note some of the objections that were made by the gentleman from Maine on Saturday last to the propositions that were advocated by me the day previous. Among other things, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that the State of Maine had increased in population less than 10 per cent during the last forty years; but I attributed that to the fact that many of the sons and daughters of Maine had gone to the great West to populate those new and growing States.

The gentleman in following me upon the succeeding day adopted the suggestion I had made, and called attention to the fact that while Maine had not increased the population within her territorial limits as some States had, her sons and daughters were found throughout the great West and had exerted a powerful influence in all of the great States in that section of our common country. And he referred particularly to Chief Justice Fuller of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the debt of gratitude that Illinois owes to the Pine Tree State.

Mr. Speaker, Illinois is quick to respond to a call of that kind. She acknowledges the debt that she owes not only to the great State of Maine, but to New England as well. Their sons and daughters have come to our State and have been welcomed among us and have become some of our best citizens in all the walks of life. They have helped to build up Illinois until she has passed all of her sister States in the West and to-day stands in the front rank of the great States of the Republic.

We are proud of those citizens, and they are proud of their adopted State. The broad prairies of Illinois, the rich soil, and the inviting climate have attracted people from New York, from Pennsylvania, from Ohio, and the Southern States as well. From whatever section of our common country they have come they have received a generous welcome in Illinois, and many of them, like Chief Justice Fuller, have been honored with high places in the State and the nation.

But, Mr. Speaker, were my knowledge of the people of the State of Maine limited to Chief Justice Fuller and the gentleman who addressed this House on Saturday last—when I contemplate the scholarly attainments, the polished manners, the uniform courtesy and fairness of Chief Justice Fuller, I am constrained to say that the sons who have left the State of Maine and have gone to Illinois and other States belong to a different type of men from those who remain at home and run for Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine, in order to show that I had made some kind of a statement which, as he insisted, could not be properly defended, quoted this language from my remarks:

> Now, it would not be in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution to give a greater representation to the fractions than to the integral numbers.

He then went on to say:

> Now, then, if that is a sound constitutional legal statement, it means simply this, that if you give 208,868 a Representative it would not be constitutional to give any less number a Representative. That is the gentleman's own statement. I quote it from the RECORD in order that he may follow it if he likes. Now, take this statement and analyze the gentleman's bill upon that basis, that no bill will be constitutional that gives a Representative in substance to a less number than the whole number. That is his proposition. How does his bill stand upon it? Well, he gives to Arkansas a Representative on the basis of 157,753.

Then, further on, after quoting again my language as I have just read it, he continued:

> You state that as a proposition of law, and it is entirely true that your whole argument gives to that legal proposition an absolute contradiction, or, as some people say, the lie.

Now, taking his statement as he gave it, it would seem that he undertook to convey the idea that I was giving a larger representation on general principles to the fraction than to the integral number. But when you read the quotation in the context it shows my position to be entirely clear and my interpretation of the Constitution to be in accordance with established principles.

After describing how we had arrived at 335 members and that there were 22 members left—4 to be apportioned to States that would have only one Representative and 18 to those with major fractions—I used this language:

> Now, what was the most equitable and just way to dispose of these fractions? The four million and odd thousands that I have mentioned would be entitled only to 22 members, on the ratio that we have already divided among the other States. That aggregation of fractions would not be entitled to 25 members, but only to 22. Now, it would not be in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution to give a greater representation to a fraction than to the integral numbers. It would not be just and proper to take this population that is represented by these various fractions and give them an increased representation. Then what is the most equitable and just way to dispose of the 22 members that represent the fractional numbers?

Then I explained how that is done. Now, Mr. Speaker, the line of argument that the gentleman indulged in, in order to get a seeming inconsistency in my statements, is the same kind of argument that the scoffer indulged in when he said the Bible was a book of blasphemy and he would prove it by reading from the Bible the words "There is no God." When the book was examined it was found that the entire sentence read, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

The other statements that have been made in regard to my attitude upon this bill are too numerous for me to follow, but I challenge the attention of the House to the fact that no statement was made by me that is not supported by the figures upon which the bill is predicated, and no statement has been made by me that is not fully carried out by precedents that extend over a period of sixty years of our national history.

When the gentleman came to argue against the increased representation upon this floor, he said that time of the members is taken up with other things, and in order not to do him injustice I will quote his exact language:

> How is the time of the members of this House occupied? Is it occupied in legislating upon this floor, or is it occupied from early morning in reading over the last mail that reaches every member voicing the wants of his constituents, 99 per cent of whose demands are aside from any legislation upon this floor?

Then, after stating another reason, he says:

> Or is it because members are obliged to look out for needy constituents who desire to be injected into office, and who, once injected, desire to be promoted or to have their salaries increased, and are not willing to rest upon a letter written to a head of a Department asking him to increase the salary or promote the needy applicant, but must insist upon a member making a personal visit to the head of the Department and pressing the claims of his constituent? [Applause.]

Is that the gentleman's conception of the duties of a member of Congress? Is that the reason that we find him so eager to have Maine given four members of Congress, instead of three, as it is given in the majority bill in this case? Is it his idea that a member should become an office broker here and beg for office and then for promotion from the heads of the different Departments? If so, I can say to the gentleman that his conception of the duties of members of this body is entirely at variance with those of his predecessor. I can say to him, what he already knows, that the civil-service law was enacted in this country years ago, and has been kept in force from that time to this, in order to keep members from doing that very thing.

What is the duty of a member? To come here and legislate. Then how is he to do it? Not by increasing the number of the members; but if it is necessary to take time and answer letters 99 per cent of which have no bearing upon legislation, let his $1,200 clerk do that. If it is necessary to get additional help, the country would support the members of this House in getting necessary assistance; but I say that when men are selected by the various districts in the States of the Union to come here they are elected to attend to their legislative duties. But, as I pointed out the other day and the gentleman himself admitted, bill after bill is passed in this House without any due consideration. Measure after measure is brought here and the members implicitly follow the lead of the committee without having that intelligent knowledge of the matter that would enable them to exercise their influence upon proposed legislation.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time has nearly expired. I desire again to call to the attention of the members of the House the fact that this is a national and not a State measure. We should look to the precedents of our fathers. Suppose the great men who assembled in Philadelphia to frame the Constitution under which we are acting had carried out sectional and State views to the extent the gentlemen who represent the minority have done. The American Republic would still be a dream. Had the people of the various colonies, when that Constitution was presented to them, been actuated by selfish motives such as we find represented in the minority report, that great document would never have been adopted which unites the 45 States into one grand Republic.

But now, Mr. Speaker, without taking further time, I trust that every member of this House will try by his vote to see not what will benefit his district, not what will benefit his State, but what will be the greatest good to the greatest number, and insure the best legislation to the people of the whole country in the future. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COUSINS, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11213. An act for the relief of occupants of lands included in the Algodones grant, in Arizona;

H. R. 11588. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Osage River at the city of Warsaw, Benton County, Mo.;

H. R. 4099. An act for the relief of the Macon Trust Company, administrator of the estate of Samuel Milliken, deceased;

H. R. 6344. An act to remove the charges of desertion from the records of the War Department against Frederick Mehring;

H. R. 2955. An act providing for the resurvey of township No. 8, of range No. 30, west of the sixth meridian, in Frontier County, State of Nebraska; and

H. R. 12447. An act to amend an act approved June 1, 1900, entitled "An act to create the southern division in the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein."

REAPPORTIONMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the first section of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the 3d of March, 1903, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 357 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows:

Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 6; California, 7; Colorado, 2; Connecticut, 4; Delaware, 1; Florida, 2; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 23; Indiana, 12; Iowa, 11; Kansas, 7; Kentucky, 10; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 3; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 13; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 8; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 15; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 5; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 9; New York, 35; North Carolina, 9; North Dakota, 1; Ohio, 20; Oregon, 2; Pennsylvania, 30; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 6; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 15; Utah, 1; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 9; Washington, 2; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 10; Wyoming, 1.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after line 2, page 1, and insert the following:

"That after the 3d day of March, 1903, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 386 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 7; California, 8; Colorado, 3; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 25; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 11; Kansas, 8; Kentucky, 11; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 14; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 16; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 6; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 10; New York, 37; North Carolina, 10; North Dakota, 2; Ohio, 21; Oregon, 2; Pennsylvania, 32; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 16; Utah, 1; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; Washington, 3; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 11, and Wyoming, 1.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is the first section of what is known as the Burleigh bill, found on page 117 of the report of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not yet in order. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] has the floor. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maine has offered an amendment to strike out and insert section 1. This will leave the House, however, the privilege of perfecting the first section before the substitute of the gentleman from Maine is voted upon; but the gentleman from Maine, on his amendment, has the floor if he desires to occupy it at this time.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, if it was not fully understood before, that the amendment I have proposed is the first section of the Burleigh bill, found on page 117 of the report of the Committee on the Census.

Mr. WHEELER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER. Would it not be in order to offer a substitute for the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. This is a substitute now pending.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the gentleman from Maine to offer an amendment to the first section.

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, is the substitute subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, when it is reached for that purpose. The first thing is the perfection of the text of the original section, after which the Burleigh amendment will be in order, to be perfected and then voted upon.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill of the majority, for the purpose of perfecting it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 5, page 1, by striking out the word "fifty-seven" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

In line 8, page 1, after the word "Colorado," strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" and after the word "Florida" strike out "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" and in line 3, page 2, after the words "North Dakota," strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof "two."

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the effect of this amendment is to increase the representation of the three States having, under the bill of the majority, a major fraction each of the basis of representation, namely, the States of Colorado, Florida, and North Dakota. The advocates of the minority or Burleigh bill charge that injustice is done these States by the majority or Hopkins bill, and some at least of the advocates of the Hopkins bill concede that if these additional Representatives were given these States as nearly exact justice would be done as can be done in any bill which may pass this House.

The proposed amendment will place the Hopkins or majority bill in such shape that if it does pass it may right the wrong proposed by the bill as introduced and reported by the committee. Permit me to call attention to this fact, that the State of North Dakota, by the census of 1900, has a population of 319,146, and a constitutional population, that is, a total less Indians not taxed, of 314,454. This is the largest number of people represented by any one member from any State or district under the Hopkins bill. It is said that anything can be proven by figures, and we had a remarkable illustration of the correctness of that saying in the discussion of this measure.

I do not contend that exact and equal justice can be done every State by any measure; but, in my judgment, the most nearly we can hope to approach it is to fix our basis of representation, and then give each State a member on that basis and an additional one for a major fraction. This is the method pursued in nearly all the States in fixing the basis of representation in Congressional, State, and other conventions. The line must be drawn somewhere, and it is drawn at the dividing line between the major and minor fraction. This applies to any House, either large or small. But in the light of figures, see for a moment what is disclosed by an analysis of the measure now before the House.

Pennsylvania is given a member for each 210,070 of its population: North Carolina, 1 for 210,423; Oregon, 1 for each 206,768; Mississippi, 1 for 221,610; New York, a member for each 207,554; South Dakota, 1 for each 195,319; New Hampshire, 1 for each 205,794; Vermont, 1 for each 107,821; Florida, 1 for 264,271, without this amendment; Colorado, 1 for 269,551, likewise before amendment, and Maine, a member for each 231,469, while North Dakota is only given 1 member for a population of 314,454. If Maine has ground for complaint what can be expected of the people of the State of North Dakota on this basis of representation? But apply a few figures in another direction. Of course from a legal standpoint this may have no effect, but the conclusion is certainly warranted that the condition of affairs in the Southern States ought to be the subject of careful investigation.

At the recent Presidential election for the leading candidates for President and Vice-President there were cast in the State of Georgia approximately 1 vote for each 19 of its population; in Louisiana, 1 vote for every 22; in Mississippi, 1 vote to 27, while in the country at large the average is about 1 to every 5 of the population, and in my State, owing to the large number of miners, about 1 to 5¼. One of two conclusions must be correct. Either a large part of the population in the Southern States is in some way prevented from exercising the right of suffrage or the people take too little interest and are too unpatriotic to do so.

Several gentlemen upon the other side attempt to explain by saying that their elections are practically settled or determined at the primaries which place their candidates in nomination, but the figures which I have used are for the election of President and Vice-President, and whatever may be the effect of primary elections upon local candidates, they certainly have no such effect upon Presidential votes.

Mr. Speaker, the solemn duty of every member of this House and his oath of office require an investigation of the conditions in those States where so small a percentage of the population makes itself heard in electing persons to the highest office in the land. It matters not how patriotic their Representatives may be, nor how their great hearts may throb in unison with the hearts of the patriotic North, the fact remains that the rights of citizenship are not exercised in those States.

But, Mr. Speaker, members of this House are well aware that usages exist not sanctioned by law, but nevertheless usages which have become so well established as to have the force of law among the members of this House and their constituents. Under such usages each member has duties to perform for his constituents outside the halls of Congress and outside his committee rooms. We are required to look after the needs of our constituents in the various Departments.

We are expected to take charge of all the post-offices in our respective districts or States, make recommendations for the appointment of proper persons, investigate applications for the establishment of new offices and increase of mail facilities, expedite applications for pensions, secure the appointment of constituents to civil offices, and a thousand and one other things. These, I doubt not, each member is ready, willing, and pleased to consider in the interests of his constituents, yet, nevertheless, all detract from his time and take his attention from the legitimate business of legislation, and necessarily in many instances to such an extent as to deprive him of the power to act intelligently on bills of great national importance.

Why, sir, the Representative from the State of North Dakota has on his list more than 650 post-offices. At least once in four years a change is asked, and in a majority of cases a contest waged. He is expected to decide on the merits of the respective applicants, and settle all the difficulties. One of his greatest burdens is to investigate and make recommendations with reference to new offices in a rapidly growing and thinly settled State, and I submit that there is not a man on this floor who, either unaided or aided by a clerk of large executive ability, can attend to these multifarious duties and have time or strength left to give any consideration whatever to matters of legislation, which should be of first importance. I submit that no member from any State in the Union has any such number of offices under his supervision as has the member from the State of North Dakota. In this respect city members have a great advantage over those from country districts. They are able to devote their energies to legislation.

Will not the members of this House give relief to the State of North Dakota, giving it such representation as a majority fraction is entitled to? This will divide the burdens incident to a new country and a new State in half. Mr. Speaker, these are not the only considerations involved in this amendment. As I have stated, the population of North Dakota is 319,146. That is an increase during ten years of 75 per cent, the largest percentage increase of any State except one. Very much the larger portion of that increase has occurred during the last five years, and it is safe to say that while the average has been 13,500, more than 20,000 has been the average increase during the past five years.

If this continues for another decade, you can very readily see, Mr. Speaker, that at the end of that period the population will be more than half a million, much of which will be represented by one member during all that time. This increase will continue. The productive Government lands are occupied in other States, and the business of the United States land offices in that State during the past year surpassed all records. The total number of acres in farms in 1900 was over 11,000,000. The number of acres under cultivation in 1890 was about 3,000,000. This acreage had increased in 1900 to more than six and one-half million.

Population, age, and everything considered, no State compares with it. Its soil is the most productive on the face of this continent, its summers the most sunny, and its winters the most exhilarating. But, Mr. Speaker, it contains other and more important elements than cereals, stock, and farms. It contains a population composed of the most thrifty, intelligent, and energetic races of the Old World, and immigrants from the rock-ribbed hills of New England and the prairies of the middle West. I suppose one-third of its population is foreign born—natives of Norway, Sweden, Germany, Russia, Great Britain, and Canada—while one-third are natives of New England, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

Pursuing very largely a common vocation and enduring common hardships, they have developed that hardihood, industry, and thrift and those other elements of good citizenship which characterized the early settlers of the Atlantic colonies. They take an interest in the affairs of government, and with them the right of free speech is never abridged. They gather at the schoolhouses, the country stores, and post-offices and discuss questions of national importance, exchange their views, and go to their homes the wiser and better prepared to cast their ballots intelligently.

With 96,000 children of school age they expend over $1,275,000 annually for school purposes. The elementary principles of civil government are taught, and from every public school float the Stars and Stripes. Love of country is the first lesson implanted in the schoolboy's breast, and his duties and obligations as an American citizen are his topic as he delivers his valedictory.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the reasons why I predict a steady growth in population during the next decade in that State, and say that, considering this and the fact that we already have a major fraction on the basis fixed by this bill, we ought not to be cut off with 1 Representative. I therefore appeal to the advocates of both these bills to not oppose this amendment.

By adopting it the inequalities and injustice of which both sides now complain will be remedied and it will become simply a question of increase in the membership of the House. By voting for this amendment you will only conform your acts to your admissions in argument and do justice to intelligent, loyal, and patriotic sections of our great country. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I shall have to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota. North Dakota, along with Colorado and Florida, will be taken care of in the minority report, and I can not consent, when their right is preserved by that minority report, that they should make terms with the enemy after battle is joined.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it would destroy the perfect symmetry which has characterized the system adopted by the chairman of the committee, and which he has adorned by his argument upon this floor, to allow those 3 States to the extent of 3 exceed his 22, which, according to his statement, already have been exhausted, as to add 3 more States to his 22, by increasing the number from 357 to 360, would destroy the two magnificent arguments with which the House has been regaled. My friend must wait until the Burleigh bill is voted upon, and I think we can assure him that North Dakota will be taken care of.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that this amendment appears to be a substitute, something after the form of the Burleigh substitute, and having the same purpose. It clearly can not be entertained at this time, or until the Burleigh substitute is disposed of.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Can not I offer it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota?

The SPEAKER. It would not be germane to that amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Can I have it considered as an amendment pending, as the Burleigh substitute is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not say that, It is not germane to the amendment offered, and it has the same appearance as the Burleigh amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I have the amendment read in my time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have that done. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by striking out all after the word "composed," in line 4, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Of 400 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: "Alabama, 10; Arkansas, 7; California, 8; Colorado, 3; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 12; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 23; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 12; Kansas, 8; Kentucky, 12; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 15; Michigan, 13; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 17; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 6; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 10; New York, 39; North Carolina, 10; North Dakota, 2; Ohio, 22; Oregon, 2; Pennsylvania, 34; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 11; Texas, 16; Utah, 1; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; Washington, 3; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 11; Wyoming, 1."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposition is to make the number of Representatives 400, and I believe that the majority of this House will agree with me that that is not too many. I am a Democrat, and one of those Democrats known as the organized Democracy, and that does not need to be reorganized.

I believe in the distribution of the Representatives among the people, and the more representation is disseminated amongst the people the more nearly we approach a republican form of government. Believing that, I shall always argue that we ought to have a large representation in Congress. If the rules, as has been complained of, do not permit deliberation, I shall live in hope that some day they may be changed so that they will afford the people better opportunities to be heard through their Representatives. I am therefore in favor of a large representation, as widely distributed among the people as possible. Having that view, I will again offer this amendment when it shall be in order.

Mr. McLAIN. Mr. Speaker, in reading over the findings of the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census, to whom was referred the question of an apportionment among the several States under that census, as provided by Article XIV, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, we find three reports. The majority report recommends that after the 3d day of March, 1903, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 357 members, the same as the present representation. Under this, Mississippi is assigned 7 members, that being her present number. The minority report, which is signed by 6 members of the committee, recommends a House consisting of 386 members, and under this apportionment Mississippi is assigned 8 members.

As to the relative merits or demerits of these two respective reports I shall not for the present discuss, but will say in passing that I shall support the minority bill known as the Burleigh bill. Under either of these two Mississippi is treated equitably and fairly. The only question involved in these two reports is at what number shall the House of Representatives be fixed. All States under either of these two propositions receive their just quota of members. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a third report, in which I am greatly interested and to which I desire to pay my respects. That report is the one made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. Out of the 13 members composing that committee he is the only one that favored it, and it is prepared and signed by him only.

In it he recommends that the size of the House be fixed at 374, and he further proposes to reduce the representation of the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina three each, for alleged disfranchisement of citizens. This being a direct blow at my State, in common with some others I feel that I should enter my protest. On yesterday he presented his views at length to this House. I am sorry, indeed, he has thrust this question upon this House. It comes unwelcome and unbidden. The committee before whom it was referred refused to indorse it. I am told that it does not meet with the views of his own party, and I am quite sure the sentiment of the country is against it.

Regardless of all this he drags it before this House, having received but little, if any, encouragement of a substantial nature from any source. I trust he is in some measure satisfied. The matter seems to lie heavily upon the gentleman's conscience, and he seems to feel it is his heaven-imposed duty to draw a special indictment against my State and some others, charging us with being lynchers and suppressers of the franchise, and upon this he asks a verdict of guilty as charged at the hands of this House, and that the sentence be that we be robbed of a portion of our constitutional representation in Congress.

The gentleman has been pressing this matter for several sessions of Congress. He is honest and sincere in his demands, but I take it he is an enthusiast, and like all extreme enthusiasts he is governed more by sentiment than by reason. Doubtless his investigations of this subject have been laborious, but chiefly from one standpoint. All men investigating a question under these conditions are liable to blunder, because they do not weigh and square things up in their true proportion and just relations to other things.

The discussion of this matter, injected in here by this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, can not be productive of any good results, but, on the contrary, I can see where evil fruit may flow from its consideration. Handling it as temperately and prudently as possible, it will have a tendency to revive the old sectional question. For this reason I would not make any remarks on the proposition if the gentleman had not embodied in his printed report and in his speech before this House on yesterday, which is now a part of the record of this House, such a bitter denunciation of my section.

If there is any question that has or will ever come before Congress which should be disarmed of all passion it is this amendment now pending before us, for it brings up in an indirect way as to how a certain section of the South can keep the Constitution of the United States inviolate and at the same time preserve their own safety and good government. Speaking for my State, what we did to restrict suffrage was not done to degrade, oppress, or impede any class of her citizens, but in the interest of good morals and clean government.

On this line he says, in speaking of the negro:

> He has no rights that the white man is bound to respect, and he may be shot down, hanged, or burned at the stake, without regard to legal procedure or sanction, with absolute impunity. The perpetrators of these crimes against civilization do not make the poor excuse that the penal machinery is inadequate. And the most appalling aspect of the situation is that in some of the most atrocious instances of mob execution the work is done in broad daylight and no effort is made on the part of the perpetrators to conceal their identity. No prosecutions ever follow. No victim of the most frenzied religious bigotry in ages past ever received more shockingly brutal treatment. The torture is indescribable. The Federal Government is powerless to prevent these outrageous crimes and the local authorities will not.

Such are some of the accusations he brings against the Southern people. "He has no rights that the white man is bound to respect," says the gentleman. This, sir, I deny. We are not outlaws banded together to plunder and rob a poor and helpless race. Speaking for my State, I assert that there is not a State in this Union more generous and liberal to this people than Mississippi. We are just and kind to him. He finds employment the year through at remunerative prices. If there is to-day an unemployed negro in my State, it is from choice or laziness. No laboring class beneath the sky extracts more real joy and pleasure, contentment, and happiness out of life than the negro of Mississippi. "He may be shot down, hanged, or burned at the stake with absolute impunity," says the gentleman from Indiana.

This is pretty strong language. It is as unkind as it is undeserved. From this language one would judge that we go out, on the slightest provocation, and shoot them down like a lot of worthless cats, or that he may be mobbed for political reasons, or from any other cause, whenever it suits our fancy. This, sir, is not true. Occasionally lynching does occur in the South, as it does in other sections of the country, not for political causes or some petty crime, but for the commission of some atrocious crime, principally rape. It has been my observation that in most any section of this Union, if some notorious defier of the law commits some flagrant crime that stirs from center to circumference the community in which it is committed, it is hard to restrain mob violence.

If some brute outrages a good and pure woman, her family and neighbors usually get aroused sufficiently to take their guns and shoot him like they would a mad dog passing through their midst. This is all wrong, but nevertheless it occurs in all parts of this Union. The mob who thus acts is aroused to desperation over the outrage on womanhood, and when it pauses to consider, shall the law deal with the wretch, it is still further bewildered, confounded, and infuriated at the thought. If this course is pursued, the outraged woman must not only face the public, a court, and jury, and there relate the unspeakable wrongs so cruelly inflicted upon her, but must also relate it in the presence of the brute who has destroyed her life.

Mob violence knows no geography when certain conditions are pressed to the front. I do not say it is right. It is to be deplored. When the gentleman makes this charge of crime against the Southern section alone, it occurs to me this is an issue he can not well afford to challenge. I do not like to be critical. As a rule, when an accusation is made against my section, I hate to answer the accuser with a counter charge on his section, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "You are another!"

But the opportunity here is too good to let the chance slip by without calling the gentleman's attention to just a little of the history and "devilment" of his own State, and in doing so I want to say to the people of that great State that I do not do this to cast any unnecessary reflections upon her good name; but one of her Representatives on the floor of this House has invited this line of argument. As he has done this, I wish to show to him, by way of comparison, that Mississippi is just as law abiding as his State—one of the foremost and most progressive States of this Union.

Are Mississippians and the people of the South generally less civilized than the people of Indiana? I think not. I do not think I can be accused of extravagance when I say the world has never known a truer and better people than the white people of the South. They are brave and hospitable, chivalric and patriotic. They are true to home and family, true to friend and themselves, true to country and to God. In what respect are the Southern people more lawless than the people of Indiana? In the light of their respective histories let them be judged.

When you turn the great searchlight of truth upon Indiana's record on this line you will find there has been as much, or more, lynchings there within the last few years than in Mississippi or any other Southern State; and as to crimes committed by "White Caps," heretofore laid at their door by the press of the country, such as whippings and other outrages, they are too numerous to mention. These lawless "White Caps" could jerk up and whip vagabonds in Indiana in great numbers and it scarcely attracted attention, but a less grav crime committed in the South on a similar class of people is solemnly accepted as proof, by the gentleman from Indiana and some others, that the negro race is being lynched, hanged, or burned at the stake. The gentleman "can see the mote in the eye" of his Southern brother, but he "can't see the gin-house in his own."

Indeed, as to lawlessness the gentleman's State easily occupies high rank. I say this in all kindness to the gentleman from Indiana and to the people of his State. Just as good people there as ever trod the green carpet of God's earth. Just as good as you will find anywhere—indeed, the great mass of her people are respecters of the law—but the people there are just like people elsewhere, that, under certain abnormal conditions, they may be provoked to violence. Human nature is the same all over the world. But before I pursue this question of lynchings and crimes in Indiana any further, I want to first show by the written history of this State, the home of the author of this bill, that she has always looked upon the negro as an inferior race, and justly so, and has discriminated against him in her laws and in her State constitution.

Let me briefly present the facts on this line. Her first constitution, adopted in 1816, contained a provision that only whites were allowed to vote and only whites could be in the militia. As time rolled on did this feeling or prejudice against the negro grow less or greater? In answer to this let the statute of 1831 speak (see revision of 1831, p. 375):

An act concerning free negroes and mulattoes, servants and slaves. (Approved February 10, 1831.)

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Indiana, That from and after the 1st day of September next no black or mulatto person coming or brought into this State shall be permitted to reside therein unless bond, with good and sufficient security, be given on behalf of such person of color, to be approved of by the overseers of the poor of some township in this State, payable to the State of Indiana, in the penal sum of $500, conditioned that such person shall not at any time become a charge to the said county in which said bond shall be given, nor to any other county in this State, as also for such person's good behavior; which bond shall be filed in the clerk's office of the county where the same may be taken. And a conviction of such negro or mulatto of any crime or misdemeanor against the penal laws of this State shall amount to a forfeiture of the condition of such bond: Provided, That on any suit brought upon such bond for the penalty thereof a less sum than the penalty may, in the discretion of the jury trying such action, be assessed against any defendant or defendants by way of damages.

SEC. 2. If any negro or mulatto coming into this State as aforesaid shall fail to comply with the provisions of the first section of this act, it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the overseers of the poor, in any township where such negro or mulatto may be found, to summon him, her, or them to appear before some justice of the peace, to show cause why he, she, or they shall not comply with the provisions of this act, which summons shall be issued by a justice of the peace on the application of any overseer of the poor in this State, and shall be executed by the proper constable. And if such negro or mulatto shall still fail to give the bond and security required by the first section of this act, after being brought before such justice as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the overseers of the poor of such township to hire out such negro or mulatto for six months, for the best price in cash that can be had. The proceeds arising from such hiring shall be paid into the county treasury of the proper county, for the use of such negro or mulatto, in such manner as shall be directed by the overseers of the poor aforesaid: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful for the overseers of the poor to remove such negro or mulatto without the jurisdiction of this State, in the same manner and under the same rules and regulations as are pointed out in the act for the relief of the poor, instead of hiring such negro or mulatto out, at the discretion of said overseers.

SEC. 3. Any sheriff or jailer who shall hereafter commit or suffer to be committed to prison any negro or mulatto without a lawful mittimus or being otherwise authorized by law for that purpose, or under the provisions of this act, shall be fined, upon presentment or indictment, in any sum not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars.

SEC. 4. Should any person or persons knowingly engage or hire or harbor such negro or mulatto, hereafter coming or being brought into this State, without such colored person first complying with the provisions of this act, such person or persons so offending shall pay a fine of not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered by presentment or indictment.

SEC. 5. That the right of any person or persons to pass through this State with his, her, or their negroes or mulattoes, servant or servants, when emigrating or traveling to any other State or Territory or country, making no unnecessary delay, is hereby declared and secured.

On March 4, 1852 (see Special Laws of Indiana, 1852, p. 175), the general assembly of Indiana passed "A joint resolution on the subject of the slave trade, and for the purpose of colonization," and in the advocacy of this plan used, among other things, this forcible language:

And that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States and of the legislatures of each of the States of this Union to enact such laws, in harmony of each other, as would promote a general system of colonization, not only for the purpose of suppressing the African slave trade, but also to separate, as far as possible, the white and the black race upon this continent by sending off, where they might consent to it, all colored persons in the United States, except those who may be held in service, to such colonial states without cost, and providing for their comfort there for a reasonable period afterwards; thus making some compensation to an injured race for the wrongs and the oppressions for ages, and relieving ourselves from a population which, although amongst, can never be of us in social or political rights, and for that cause are at all times liable to become a source of public charge and of public annoyance in each State where they may reside, and of causing irritation and bad neighborhood in the feelings of the States themselves.

You will note that this resolution expressly emphasizes the fact that this course of colonization will be of great benefit in "relieving ourselves from a population which, although amongst, can never be of us in social or political rights, and for that cause are at all times liable to become a source of public charge and of public annoyance in each State where they may reside." But I must pass on. I will next call your attention to the constitution of 1851 of Indiana:

ARTICLE II.

SUFFRAGE AND ELECTION.

SEC. 5. No negro or mulatto shall have the right of suffrage.

ARTICLE XIII.

NEGROES AND MULATTOES.

SECTION 1. No negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in the State after the adoption of this constitution.

SEC. 2. All contracts made with any negro or mulatto coming into the State contrary to the provisions of the foregoing section shall be void, and any person who shall employ such negro or mulatto, or otherwise encourage him to remain in the State, shall be fined in any sum not less than $10 nor more than $500.

SEC. 3. All fines that may be collected for violation of the provisions of this article, or any law which may hereafter be passed for the purpose of carrying the same into execution, shall be set aside and appropriated for the colonization of such negroes and mulattoes, and their descendants, as may be in the State at the adoption of this constitution and may be willing to emigrate.

SEC. 4. The general assembly shall pass laws to carry out the provisions of this article.

This constitution was adopted by the people in 1852, and the general assembly of the State on June 18, 1852 (see Indiana Revised Statutes, 1852, p. 375), passed an act to enforce and carry out the provisions of the above article of the constitution.

Did the people of Indiana pursue this question any further? Let me read from the statute of Indiana (see Laws of Indiana, 1853), which speaks for itself:

Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Indiana: No Indian, or person having one-eighth or more of negro blood, shall be permitted to testify as a witness in any cause in which any white person is a party in interest.

The supreme court of Indiana (see 7 Indiana Reports, p. 389) in the case of Barkshire vs. The State, in passing upon the thirteenth article of the constitution and the act of 1852 to enforce its provisions, says:

The thirteenth article of the constitution, in inaugurating this policy, was separately submitted to a vote of the people, under the title of "Exclusion and colonization of negroes." It is a matter of history how emphatically it was approved by the popular voice. A constitutional policy so decisively adopted, and so clearly conducive to the separation and ultimate good of both races, should be rigidly enforced.

This decision was rendered in 1856. After the civil war the supreme court of Indiana (see Smith vs. Moody et al., 26 Indiana Reports, p. 299), in 1866, held that the thirteenth article of the constitution of Indiana and the act of June 18, 1852, enforcing the provisions of the same, are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Such in brief, Mr. Speaker, is the legislative history of Indiana on this negro question. Of course, all legislation of this character, in this and all other States, has been swept away by the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. But has this brushed away that racial distinction and feeling that gave birth to these now obsolete statutes? These laws passed in her early history clearly show that she did not regard the negro as a safe and fit person to be armed with suffrage, and this is my chief reason in pointing out these laws, and not with the view of attempting to cast any aspersion upon the great Commonwealth of Indiana.

Has these changed conditions in the law obliterated all race feeling in that State? Let us see. Here within the last month pandemonium, so to speak, broke loose in the towns of Rockport, Boonville, and Cementville. The mob killed two negroes in the town of Brookville and one in Rockport, and from the facts connected with this lawless and bloody scene it seems, quoting the language of the gentleman from Indiana, "he has no rights that the white man is bound to respect, and he may be shot down, hanged, or burned at the stake, without regard to legal procedure or sanction, with absolute impunity." "And the most appalling aspect of the situation is" that this most atrocious exhibition of mob execution "is done in broad daylight and no effort is made on the part of the perpetrators to conceal their identity."

Remember this bloody tragedy occurred in the very heart of the towns of Rockport and Boonville, having a population of 2,822 and 2,037, respectively. But for all this would you denounce the people of Indiana as criminals? Would you denounce the people of these towns as outlaws? I think not. Again I repeat, human nature is the same the world over. The race feeling and the lynching of negroes, when certain conditions materialize, occurs as freely in Indiana as it does in any part of the South. How and why this recent lynching occurred can be better told by the following clipping from the Courier-Journal of December 19, 1900:

SHORT WORK MADE OF TWO NEGROES BY INDIANA MOB—WENT AFTER A THIRD, BUT WERE DEFIED BY HIS EMPLOYER—WHITE BARBER MURDERED—WAYLAID AND ROBBED AS HE RETURNED FROM HIS WORK—BLOODHOUNDS ON THE TRAIL—QUICKLY TOOK THE SCENT AND CARRIED IT TO WHERE THEY WERE IN JAIL—EVERYTHING OPENLY DONE.

[Special.]

ROCKPORT, IND., December 18.

The murder of a white barber at an early hour this morning was followed by the lynching to-night of two negroes, James Henderson and Bud Rowland. On Saturday night about 1 o'clock H. S. Simons, a barber, was waylaid and murdered on his way home from his shop. His body was not discovered till about 5 o'clock this morning, and at once Henderson and Rowland were suspected of the crime. Sheriff Anderson arrested both of them at 9 o'clock and put them in jail. Henderson lives in North Rockport and Rowland was at Henderson's home when the arrests were made.

The people were thoroughly enraged and determined to avenge the brutal murder of Simons as soon as it could be definitely determined who the murderers were.

BLOODHOUNDS TOOK THE SCENT.

A telegram to Morganfield, Ky., resulted in a bloodhound being on the spot where the crime was committed in a few hours. The dog went direct from where Simons's body was found to Henderson's home, and then from there to the cell in the jail where Henderson had been placed some seven or eight hours before.

There was no restraining the enraged people longer. Everybody knew there was going to be a lynching. Sheriff Anderson sent his family away from the jail residence to the Veranda Hotel.

THE MOB FORMS.

As soon as dark began to gather over the little city signs of the organizing mob were easily discernible. Hundreds of men began to move toward the jail, and by 7 o'clock 500 people had surrounded the jail and made a demand for Henderson and Rowland. Jailer Anderson refused to surrender them, and the mob attacked the jail. They overpowered him to get possession of the keys, and he told them he had sent the keys away.

JAIL DOORS BATTERED DOWN.

The mob then attacked the jail doors with axes and sledges. It required nearly three-quarters of an hour to batter down the doors and get on the inside. Henderson was in a cell in the lower tier and Rowland in the upper. The door to Rowland's cell soon gave way, but the door to Henderson's cell was more strongly built and successfully resisted the attack.

ANOTHER NEGRO ACCUSED.

Growing impatient the mob fired about 20 shots into Henderson's cell and into his body. Rowland was taken out and before he was strung up made a confession. He said that he and Henderson and another negro named Joe Rolla, night porter at the Veranda Hotel, committed the crime, and the motive was robbery. He said that Rolla held Simons while he beat him over the head with an iron bar and Henderson with a billet of wood.

BOTH BODIES STRUNG UP.

Rowland was strung up, and by this time Henderson's body had been gotten out of the cell, and it was strung up beside Rowland. The mob then riddled the bodies with bullets, over 500 shots being fired.

THE MOB DEFIED.

Then the enraged crowd made a rush for the Veranda Hotel to secure Rolla, implicated by Rowland in his confession. Mr. C. R. de Bruler, proprietor of the hotel, had already heard of Rowland's confession, and knowing it to be false as to Rolla, took his stand at the door to Rolla's room, and, with drawn pistols told the mob that Rolla was innocent, and they would have to kill him before they could get Rolla.

Two or three cooler heads in the mob insisted that Mr. De Bruler, who was an honorable citizen, be given an opportunity to prove the innocence of Rolla. Mr. De Bruler then mounted a counter and made a speech to the mob. He said he knew personally that Rolla was not away from the hotel Saturday night, and he called other witnesses, by whom he substantiated the fact, and the mob dispersed.

Rolla then left the city as quickly as he could get away.

ROBBERIES HAD BEEN COMMON.

The feeling in Rockport to avenge the murder of Simons was intensified by the fact that within the past two weeks about a dozen houses have been robbed, and Henderson and Rowland were suspected. Other negroes are also suspected, and unless the robberies cease there may be other lynchings.

The mob was a determined one, but it went quietly and coolly about its business. The members would have brooked no resistance, and had Sheriff Anderson undertaken to protect the negroes with a guard there might have been a bloody battle.

COMPOSED OF BEST PEOPLE.

The mob was composed of the best people of Rockport. They wore no masks, and they did not make any effort at all to conceal their identity. They were orderly, and only 15 or 20 shots were fired in the air to keep bystanders from crowding up.

Within one hour after the mob attacked the jail they had finished their work.

VICTIM A MARRIED MAN.

Simons was a young man 29 years of age. He was married, and left a wife and one child. He came to Rockport from Winslow, Ind., about two years ago. He was an honest, industrious young man, and was highly respected.

The wounds upon his head presented a shocking sight. There were twelve distinct cuts on the head and face. His head was beat into a jelly, the left eye was knocked out, and the brains oozed out of his skull. The weapons used were a bar of iron about 2 feet long and an oak standard from a wagon sideboard.

EXODUS OF NEGROES.

Eight other negroes were arrested as suspects, but they were able to establish alibis. It has created such intense fear that several negroes have disappeared from Rockport to-night, and those remaining in the city are staying off the streets.

After the mob dispersed many went to their homes, while hundreds crowded around the hotels and other public places to discuss the lynching; and the declaration was boldly made that every time a future robbery occurred in Rockport the people were going to ferret out the robbers and string them up; that robbery had become so common and so bold that safety to the people demanded that stringent measures be resorted to in order to check it.

Theodore Evans, brother-in-law of Simons, and also his partner in business, is prostrated as the result of Simons's murder, and the attending physicians say his life is in danger.

THE CRIME MOST BRUTAL—NEGROES FRIGHTENED AWAY BEFORE THEY COULD ROB THEIR VICTIM.

[Special.]

ROCKPORT, IND., December 16.

The place where Simons met his fate was an ideal place for such murderous work. It was near the corner of Fifth and Elm streets. A high board fence faces the pavement for about 40 feet, and terminates in an alleyway. When he reached this place, he was struck by one of the negroes with a long club, which had a nail in the end of it, crushing his skull. The nail entered his forehead and came out through the eye.

The indications show that a fierce and desperate struggle followed, as the ground had been trampled down and was covered with blood for a distance of about 15 feet up and down the edge of the road.

Simons's cries and groans soon brought Frank Jones and Billy Stateler, two country boys, who were returning home, to the scene, but it was too dark to see anything. They then lit a match, and one of the robbers, who was hiding behind the fence, threw the tail gate of a wagon at them to frighten them away, as the robbers had not had sufficient time to search their victim after committing their nefarious crime.

The gate struck Stateler on the leg and severely wounded him, and he is now confined to his bed on account of it. The robbers then made good their escape, as the two boys who so bravely came to the rescue stayed by the victim and lustily called for help.

A small crowd soon collected, and after a futile search for the criminals they carried the murdered man to the home of his brother-in-law, where he lingered until 4 o'clock, but never regained consciousness.

Simons's head was crushed and beaten into a pulp, while his face was bruised and cut in a number of places.

The nail had entered the head six times, making terrible wounds.

A PREMONITION OF DANGER.

The two negroes were familiar with the fact that Simons always carried the money belonging to the firm, and they were seen on Main street as late as 1 a. m. watching for their victim. Saturday night Simons suggested to his partner that something might happen and requested him to take half of the money, seeming to have a premonition that danger was lurking in the near future for him. For the past three years he had been treasurer, and this was the first time the rule was broken. He had $42.50 in a shot bag on the inside of his overcoat pocket, but the footpads failed to get anything, as they were compelled to run away to avoid being recognized and probably captured.

From early morning a large crowd of citizens congregated at the place of the crime and continued to grow larger, and when evening came there was a gathering of about 2,000 citizens, and all eager to see the culprits caught and mobbed. The citizens organized a vigilance league in the morning and raised a large fund for the purpose of apprehending the murderers and ferreting out all kinds of crime. The past week there have been four cases of housebreaking, besides a number of smaller stealing offenses. This work has been carried on extensively for the past two months, and when this additional piece of crookedness was added to the already crowded calendar of crime almost every citizen in the town was willing that some desperate method should be practiced, as life and property were getting to be valued too cheaply by the criminals here.

ONE MORE VICTIM OF BLOODTHIRSTY ROCKPORT MOB.

[Special.]

BOONVILLE, IND., December 17.

The negro known as "Whistling Joe" Rolla, an alleged accomplice in the murder of H. F. Simons at Rockport early Sunday morning, met his death at the hands of a mob from Spencer County, which came to Boonville this afternoon for that purpose. The mob numbered about 75 people, was orderly and went about its business with the precision of soldiers under orders.

The Spencer County authorities failed to locate "Crowfoot," who is known as "Whistling Joe," after the mob had made away with Henderson and Rowland Sunday night. It appears that Crowfoot had been secreted in the Veranda Hotel by the manager under a bed occupied by a commercial traveler, and he remained there in mortal dread until early this morning.

After the lynching, as told in to-day's Courier-Journal, the mob went to the hotel where Rolla was employed and made a search of all the vacant rooms and left satisfied that the accused man was not there. Sheriff Anderson got word that Rolla was secreted in the house and arrested him.

PROTECTED BY SHERIFF ANDERSON.

The sheriff immediately threw a guard around the house, and as soon as the fact of the arrest was made known, a great crowd gathered about the hotel. Angry threats were made, but the sheriff told the mob that the man insisted on his innocence and that he had ordered the guards to defend the prisoner with their lives. At this the crowd became more orderly, and a guard of citizens was thrown around the hotel to prevent the escape of the man. Just before noon the sheriff got the negro into a closed carriage and drove in hot haste for Boonville, his intention being to take the negro to Evansville for safe-keeping.

MOB QUICKLY FOLLOWED.

The sheriff had an hour's start of a mob that was quickly gathered and put on horseback to follow him. The mob divided into two parts, taking different roads to Boonville, which is 20 miles away. The sheriff beat the mob to Boonville some hours and placed the negro in jail here. A telephone message from Rockport warned the sheriff that the mob was en route, and he then attempted to get possession of the prisoner in order to make an overland drive to Evansville. Sheriff Anderson was refused admittance to the jail and gave up any further attempt to succor the black man.

WAITED UNTIL NIGHTFALL.

The mob, finding that it had been outwitted and not caring to enter the city in daylight, awaited until nightfall and entered the town on a brisk run on horseback. It made straight for the jail. Entrance was demanded and refused. The jail keys were also demanded and refused, and the same tactics that were carried out at Rockport were resorted to.

JAIL WALL BATTERED DOWN.

A telephone pole was secured and made into a battering-ram, and the walls of the jail were battered down in a few minutes. The jail is a weak affair of ancient construction, and offered slight resistance to the fury of the mob. Once inside, it was but the work of a few minutes to get into his cell.

While the mob was at work on the outside "Whistling Joe's" screams for mercy could be heard above the din. He cried that he was innocent of the crime; that he had been lied upon, and called upon the Almighty to give him strength to combat his pursuers.

PROTESTED INNOCENCE TO THE LAST.

Reaching the cell of the accused man, the door was soon battered in and a rope quickly tied about his neck. The mob then made a rush for the northwest corner of the court-house grounds; a tall tree with a convenient limb was selected, and "Whistling Joe" was given an opportunity to make his peace with God. He spent his time, however, in protesting his innocence, and the mob growing tired of this, the order was given to haul him up.

This was done, the rope being tied to the tree trunk and the body left dangling in the night air. It was announced that the body would be permitted to hang until to-morrow afternoon before it would be cut down.

NO HAND TO STAY THE MOB.

During the time the mob was in the city there was no attempt to thwart its work of revenge. The streets were crowded with men, women, and children, but not a hand was raised to stay the sentence of Judge Lynch. The mob wore no masks, and did its work with promptness as the commands were given. The order was given to "Keep your guns in your pockets," which, no doubt, was a matter of precaution, since two innocent bystanders had been wounded at Rockport during the lynching on Sunday night.

Governor Mount ordered out the Evansville militia company this evening to meet the train from Boonville, no doubt hoping the sheriff of Spencer would be able to bring his prisoner to this city. An order for them to return to their armory was received after the company had reached the depot and was about to board a special train to come to Boonville.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on, submitting other newspaper reports of lawlessness, but I will not further occupy the time of the House on this point. Only on last Christmas Day, just a few days ago, a most disgraceful race riot occurred in the town of Cementville, the facts of which, I take it, are familiar to you all, as they have been freely published in the press of the country. A few days ago I saw from the press that the bondsmen of the sheriff of Ripley County, Ind., have settled the suit for damages brought by the widow of one of the five men who were lynched in that county some years ago, by paying the sum of $4,000. With this lawless record lying at the door of this State, may I not with perfect justness say to the gentleman from Indiana, "Physician, heal thyself?" But I have said enough along this line.

The gentleman severely criticises Mississippi's franchise law. Before we begin the discussion of this subject let us first surround ourselves with the facts. In 1890 the people of Mississippi did call a convention of her people with the view of revising her fundamental law. Upon the suffrage question that convention did declare in substance that—every male inhabitant of this State, except idiots, insane persons, and Indians not taxed, who is a citizen of the United States, 21 years old and upward, who has resided in this State two years and one year in the election district or city, town, or village in which he offers to vote, and who is able to read any section of the constitution of the State, or, if unable to read the same, who is able to understand the same when read to him, or give a reasonable interpretation thereof, and who shall have been duly registered as an elector by an officer of this State under the laws thereof, and who has never been convicted of bribery, burglary, theft, arson, obtaining money or goods under false pretenses, perjury, forgery, embezzlement, or bigamy, and who has paid all taxes which have been legally required of him, and of which he has had an opportunity to pay according to law, for the two preceding years, and who shall produce to the officers holding the election satisfactory evidence that he has paid such taxes on or before the 1st day of February of the year in which he shall offer to vote, shall be a qualified elector in and for the election district, or city, town, or village of his residence, and shall be entitled to vote at any election held not less than four months after his registration; but any minister of the gospel, in charge of any organized church, shall be entitled to vote after six months residence in the election district, city, town, or village, if otherwise qualified." (Mississippi Code, 1892, section 3031.)

No one has ever seriously contended that our franchise laws violated any provision of the Federal Constitution. They merely attempt to suppress by lawful means those who do not pay taxes and her ignorant and criminal class from exercising the right of suffrage. The supreme court of Mississippi in passing upon these laws held we had a right to do so, and the Supreme Court of the United States held they were not violative of the Constitution of the United States, and that they do not, on their face, discriminate between the white and negro races, and do not amount to a denial of the equal protection of the law secured by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. This whole matter is fully discussed in the case of Williams vs. Mississippi in the United States Reports, volume 170.

It is well known that the reasons and causes that led to this action on the part of Mississippi was the vast and ignorant negro population with which she was surrounded. I believed then, and I believe now, that it was to the interest, the growth, and the happiness of our State that she should use every constitutional means in her gift to lodge the power of the State government in the hands of the intelligence of the State. It was to the interest of both races. In doing this her laws looking to that end fall with equal weight upon the white and the black man, and if either does not possess the qualifications for a voter as laid down in our law, he can not vote. Thousands of both races fail to qualify themselves as voters.

Strange as it may appear, the clause of our law under which 90 per cent of this class are disfranchised, in my opinion, is that part of the law requiring one before he votes to be duly registered and to have paid all taxes which have been legally required of him for the two preceding years of the year he offers to vote. Remember we have a poll tax of $2, and that tax is a lien only upon taxable property. No criminal proceedings are allowed to enforce the collection of the poll tax. It might be said this section of the law is an invitation, or at least a temptation, to some who own no property, or to some who own no property in excess of that which is exempt from taxation, not to pay their poll tax.

This is the law under which so many of our people are disfranchised. Some do it from choice, some from indifference and neglect, and some from inability to pay. Right here I wish to read an article published in the New Orleans Picayune several weeks ago, from its regular correspondent at Jackson, Miss., showing certain developments upon an investigation of the vote of Hinds County, Miss., the largest and wealthiest county in our State:

A registered voter is not necessarily a qualified elector. A man may register, and default afterwards for poll tax, and his name still remain on the poll book as a registered voter for years. This was shown in Hinds County last year, when the board of supervisors found 1,185 names improperly on the poll books when they were considering a petition for a local-option election. Nine-tenths of these were poll-tax delinquencies, and 90 per cent of them were of white men. In this matter Hinds County was not singular. The Democratic press of the State has shown like conditions in other counties, and today the press of Mississippi is urging the white men of the State to pay their poll tax in order that they may vote.

Mr. Speaker, I might go on and relate to this House the details of our law in reference to our election machinery, but I have not the time. So I will pass on.

The gentleman further criticises the following section of our constitution:

On and after the 1st day of January, 1892, every elector, in addition to the foregoing qualifications, shall be able to read any section of the constitution of this State, or shall be able to understand the same when read to him, or give a reasonable interpretation thereof.

The gentleman says, "The most difficult and technical section of the constitution is made the test." I presume persons in Mississippi have qualified under this section, but I have never known or heard of one doing so. Many may have done so, but my opinion is few, if any, have qualified under it. But be that as it may, I want to say that this much-abused section is not understood by those who criticise it. It is a section to aid illiterates. If a person can read, the section does not apply to him. If he can not read, then he has a chance to qualify under it.

It might occur to some to ask, What would it profit one to qualify under this section? For if he can not read, how could he vote under your ballot system? The answer is that our law has made special provisions for such by providing that a voter who declares to the managers of the election that by reason of inability to read he is unable to mark his ballot, if the same be true, shall, upon request, have the assistance of a manager in the marking thereof.

He further complains that too much power is placed in the hands of the registrar. Under our law if the registrar refuses to register anyone, that party, if he feels himself aggrieved, can appeal to the election commissioners. Should they decide adversely to him, he can appeal to the circuit court.

Again, the gentleman says:

In order to make the dominion of the white man complete, all opportunity for education must be taken from the negro. The policy is to deprive him of the right to vote and then withdraw from him the means of education, so he will have no ambition to contest for supremacy with the white man in any of the fields of usefulness.

Mr. Speaker, standing here speaking for my State, I say, sir, the charge is absolutely without foundation, but, on the contrary, the facts are abundant to show the reverse. The very constitution of our State that he saw fit to assail so freely on the floor of this House on yesterday provides, in substance, that it shall be the duty of the legislature to encourage, by all suitable means, the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral, and agricultural improvement by establishing a uniform system of free schools, by taxation or otherwise, for all children between the ages of 5 and 21 years, and when practicable to establish schools of higher grade.

It further provides, in substance, that a public school shall be maintained in each school district in the county at least four months during each scholastic year. Mr. Speaker, this is the fundamental law of our State. Have we lived up to its provisions? Has the legislature of our State put it into full and complete operation? Yes; it has done so most liberally and upon a most magnificent scale. No State in this Union, in accordance to the wealth of our people, has done more. The last legislature of our State appropriated for public education for the year of 1900 $1,000,000 for common schools and $272,534 for our State colleges (white and black), and a like sum for the year 1901.

This fund is distributed pro rata, regardless of race, to the different counties, and the colored educable children being about 100,000 more than the white, they, of course, receive the largest share of this fund. Is this all we do? Not by any means. In addition to this, nearly every village, town, and city in our State supplements this amount received from the State fund by an amount sufficient to run the public schools in their respective localities from seven to ten months in the year. The negro receives his pro rata share of this also. Under this system every child in our State has an opportunity to attend a public school from four to ten months in the year.

What has she done and what is she doing for higher education in our midst? Let the facts speak. She maintains and owns three as great colleges as exist in the South for the education of the white youth of the land. Nor has she on this line neglected the negro, for she has also one magnificent college for the education of the youth of the negro race. She also contributes liberally to two other institutions run in the interest of higher education of the negro. I am reliably informed that, from the best data obtainable, the proportion of taxes paid by the two races is 93 per cent for the white and 7 per cent for the negro.

In the face of these facts I respectfully submit, does not this record of my State refute the charge that we are unlawfully denying the ballot, or that we are withdrawing the means of education from any class of our people "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude?" It shows that the nonvoter and the poor and helpless receive the protection and blessings of our government as freely as the rich and the strong.

Does it not show, further, that we realize that our public-school system and our great institutions of learning are the chief allies and guardians of good morals and good citizenship, and that they materially aid in purifying the moral atmosphere to flow pure and healthful in and through our great Commonwealth? And does it not further show that we have poured out our money without stint to further the ends of this great school system of ours? I think so.

I think this magnificent record does all this. It does more. It certifies that we are striving to be "a land rejoicing and people blest." Just a few words more, Mr. Speaker, and I will have finished. I am not going to discuss the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana any further. The other features of his proposition, in fact, every feature of it, have been thoroughly discussed by others. I trust it will be promptly voted down. I feel sure it will be.

The twentieth century is upon us. The nineteenth has passed into history. Our future as a nation seems bright. It is glorious, and I hope, with the birth of the new century, all ill feeling between the North and South will be buried. I hope the following utterance of that great and independent paper, the Washington Post, will prove true:

This nation is not going into the new century with a revival of sectional animosity; the second McKinley Administration is not going to be a new era of ill feeling between the North and the South. The South will not be further punished by Congress for the fateful mistake of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I have sought diligently on both sides of this House to get an opportunity to be heard during general debate on this measure. I believed it was due me, inasmuch as I am the sole representative of one-eighth of the entire population of the United States, and that entire percentage has been so grossly misrepresented and maligned by three gentlemen, representing three separate States, upon this floor.

I am glad to state, however, that those three gentlemen are all young men, and as an extenuating circumstance for their vile words against my people I apply to them the statute of youth. They will know better when they get older. [Laughter and applause.] Some time in the near future, when the committee to which I am assigned has a bill under consideration, I will take occasion to endeavor, perhaps as a valedictory of the negro in this House, to answer some of the charges made by the gentleman from Alabama, the gentleman from South Carolina, and my colleague from North Carolina.

They have spoken of my people as a thing to be managed. They have said to the North and the East and the West, "Let alone the negroes; we can manage them." Can they manage us like oxen? I want them to understand that, removed as we are thirty-five years from slavery, we are to-day as you are, men, and claim the right of the American citizen and the right to vote. [Applause.] I will not refer to the matter under consideration now. It is not my purpose to do so at this time.

I did think, and I thought it rather strange, that the gentlemen managing the two sides of this question, the majority and the minority, after my people had been so slandered, might have accorded me an opportunity to defend them, as only two or three gentlemen have taken the opportunity to do. God bless them. God bless Judge CRUMPACKER, who has taken occasion to stand up in his place as a man, and has said a word in defense of these people who have made it possible for some of these young gentlemen to be filling seats here, and who since their emancipation have served their country faithfully by allying themselves with those principles that tend to the upbuilding of this the greatest nation on God's green earth. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desired to have something to say about this bill in the time allowed for general debate, but I was unable to get the opportunity to do so. I sought time from the gentleman whose bill I intended to vote for, the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS], and asked him for the beggarly amount of ten minutes, and he promised it, if he could. I wanted to give the House the reason I was going to vote for his bill, which does not altogether suit me. I asked for time to-day, cutting it down to five minutes, and he again promised me that he would give it to me if he could. He did not do it yesterday and he did not do it to-day, and I must conclude, therefore, that he could not do it.

Now, if there is anything on earth I despise and hate it is a machinized House of Representatives. The argument that has been made here that the House had become unwieldy was one made in support of the majority bill. They did not want to make if further unwieldy. I think that is true if the present régime is to be perpetuated, if this House is to continue machinized. I quote with approval what the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said in his speech yesterday as to the rules of this House:

Mr. Speaker, I think that the whole question involved here is one of expediency. What is the better size? What number of Representatives can best perform the duties that devolve upon them in a deliberative body? Not this body, for I am willing to confess here that it presents none of the features of a deliberative body [laughter], but that deliberative body that we ought to have. The fathers gave us their opinion with regard to this matter. When they provided for 26 Senators they provided for 65 Representatives. That was their idea. They thought that the political power of a member of the Senate should be two and a half times greater than the political power of a Representative.

* * * * * * *

Gentlemen tell us now, who are advocates for enlarging this House, on other occasions that the fact of an enlarged House justifies a system of government in the House that is destructive to the individuality of members, and absolutely destructive of the representative power that the Constitution gives us and that our people fondly think we enjoy.

When you attack the system of rules that we have, that is vicious in every degree, that is harmful to the individual character of the member, that is harmful to the deliberative character of this body, that absolutely destroys it, and puts it beyond the power of any individual to participate in legislation or to bring to the consideration of this House any measure, no matter how important it may be to him or his people, without he gets the consent of another person, another Representative—when you attack that vicious system, you are told that it is because the House is a mob, because it has been so enlarged that individual responsibility does not weigh upon the members; because there is no possibility in the confusion of the vast number to secure that deliberation that is necessary to the proper discharge of public business. On those occasions the House is too large. I believe it is wiser, I believe it would be better for the people, and it would be better for the individual membership, to decrease, rather than increase, the number of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I want this House to have the largest number of persons that it can to discharge the business that it has to transact; but I do not want its number to be so augmented as will furnish an argument for the binding of the hands of the individual members of the House. And I know, and every one of you know, that it will be urged, and that it will have its effect upon certain members who have to vote upon a question of the rules before they have had an opportunity to chafe under the restraints and tyrannies of those rules.

And I know that when the placid gentleman now occupying the chair, the leader upon this side, my venerable friend on my right, and a corresponding number of gentlemen occupying corresponding positions on that side of the House, in the early days of the session, when the neophyte is here and has not been hazed [laughter], he sees them standing up as advocates of a retention of the rules without change, he naturally says to himself, "This must be all right, or such leaders, who have the confidence of the American people, would not be their advocates," forgetting, or never knowing in his innocence, that these gentlemen belong to the charmed circle [laughter]; that these gentlemen, because of their great eminence, because of their marked and recognized superiority, have a power in this House that is above rule, or that compels the amelioration of the rule in their behalf whenever they propose to invoke it.

Mr. Speaker, I heard a gentleman in this debate, in support of this enlarged number, say that this House could do whatever it chose. I want to deny that statement. I make the assertion here that there is no proposition that affects the people of my State or of any one of the States that an individual member can secure even consideration of without he first addresses himself to another Representative and gets the consent of that Representative. [Applause.] I remember of hearing my friend on my right once say that under the rules of this House the House could do whatever it chose. I would yield to him a moment for the purpose of asking him if, after reflection, he would contradict the statement that I have here so deliberately made?

Mr. GROSVENOR. After the very high compliment that the gentleman from Iowa has seen fit to bestow on me I would not contradict anything that he would say. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Thank you. I now appreciate the value of compliments, and I shall henceforth use them in the place of arguments. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, the statement that I have made is a grave one. It ought not to be made without deliberation. I ought not to say to the American people that the whole scheme and plan of the Constitution with regard to this House of Representatives is subverted, destroyed, annihilated by the rules of this House without it was true.

And I will ask any gentleman, and I will yield to him if he will undertake to tell us, how any proposition can be brought before this House without it receives the assent of the Speaker of the House. And even then, with reference to a great majority of propositions, how can it be brought to the House after it once has gone into the bosom of a committee and that committee does not see fit to report it?

Every member upon this floor, 356 of us, may be anxious for the adoption of a proposition, and it can not be brought to the consideration of the House by any possible means known to the law without the consent of that gentleman into whose hands you and I have surrendered the political power of our constituents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the excuse for this? Mind you, I am not criticising the old Speakers or the new. I have no complaint to make of the manner in which they administer their power. I am quarreling with ourselves, and we will be asked to continue this robbery of ourselves, this wrong to our constituents, this surrender of their political power—for it is theirs, gentlemen, and not yours or mine—we will be asked to continue this. Why? Because the House is so large, because it is so unwieldly, because the confusion is so great, that business can not be transacted without it. Therefore from time to time the surrender is made.

I want that we shall act on this bill so that we will not give added force to declarations that are made in that behalf in the near future. I think that even with the number that we have there is confusion. My friend called attention to it to-day when the important matter was being settled as to when we should reach a vote upon this question. Time and again the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was compelled to rise in his place and insist that although important business was being transacted publicly here upon the floor he could not hear a word that was said. He could not tell whether to object or not, and the efforts which the Speaker vigorously exerted time and again were necessary in order to get that slight measure of order that would permit even the gentleman, seated where he is, to hear what was going on in the House.

I hope gentlemen who object to this tyranny when the time comes will vote against these rules. Now, I want to know why we should be limited in discussion to three or four days on a bill that only comes before us once every ten years, and when it gets to the other end of this Capitol if they want to discuss it three weeks they do it. Gentlemen, why should not we have the same opportunity to discuss a measure which is being enacted into law as they have? The President can not sign the bill until they pass upon it.

If the gentlemen who support the Burleigh bill will convince me that they will quit lying down and voting for these tyrannous rules and give each member on the floor an opportunity to say why he votes as he does, I will vote for that measure. But if an enlarged House is going to serve as an excuse for the continuation of these rules I shall vote against enlarging the House.

I have no objection to a reasonable limitation of debate, but I most assuredly object to unjust discrimination as to who shall participate in that debate. What right has the gentleman from Illinois to say that I shall not give to the House the reasons for the faith that is in me, and that my constituents must depend upon his argument for the reasons of my vote? What right had the gentleman to get up from his seat and ask that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] be allowed to proceed to the conclusion of his remarks, when the gentleman from Maine was doing everything he could to annihilate the bill of the gentleman from Illinois?

That was magnanimous; I approve of the spirit that led him to do it, but why did not he ask sufficient time for general debate in the House for each member to have the paltry amount of five or ten minutes to express himself? Why, we had better sit here all summer, prolong the length of the session if necessary, in order to give sufficient time for debate and discussion. We had better have it all summer, all the fall, and all winter than to stifle the voice of the representatives of the people on the floor as is done at the present time. I will vote to reduce the membership of the House to 250 if necessary in order to get out from under our present tyranny. [Applause.]

I am ready to admit that if each member of this House should speak on a measure that the same length of time could not be accorded to each member that can be to each Senator. But why should ten hours of debate be accorded to a bill in the Senate, where there are only 90 members, and only two hours be given for debate on the same measure in this House, where there are 357 members? I have not stated an extreme case. In the extra session in 1897 the House was limited to ten days for debate on the Dingley tariff bill, and the Senate debated the same measure for nearly four months.

We hear a great deal said in here about the dispatch of business and a great array of the number of bills introduced in the House and in the Senate by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], showing that a great many more bills had been introduced in the House in a given time than in the Senate, as though the House and Senate were in a race to see which body could introduce and pass the greater number of bills, and that the House had far exceeded the Senate, due to the rules of the House in expediting the public business, when everybody knows that the Senate must consider and pass all the bills of the House before they become laws.

Mr. Speaker, what good is it to the country to pass a thousand bills in the House during a session when we know the Senate will not consider and pass half that number? The boast of the dispatch of business is rather in appearance than in fact. There is absolutely no sense in the House passing a greater number of bills than the Senate will consider and pass in the same length of time.

This cry for the dispatch of business is used to cover up the real purpose of these infernal rules. The real purpose of these rules is to machinize this House; to create a one-man power; to magnify the machine and minimize the member.

If measures were more thoroughly discussed here, it would not require so much time for discussion in the Senate. By acting as we do we dwarf the influence and power of the individual members of this House and correspondingly increase and magnify the power of the individual Senator.

Members of this House have become disgusted and do not try to get time by begging for it from another member, who by the laws and Constitution has no higher or greater rights than himself. Modesty and merit usually go together, and many members who are very able and learned and who could shed much light upon subjects under discussion are too modest to push themselves onto another member who has control of the time.

Those who belong to the charmed inner circle get all the time they wish, and when one of these great members of the inner circle has had his full hour and has not finished his speech another member of the charmed inner circle jumps to his feet and asks unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks. Of course the inner circle will not object, and it would be suicidal for any member on the outside to object. Immediately the great member thanks the House for the courtesy and continues his speech as long as it suits his sweet will to do so.

The new member or modest member, be his merits what they may, must sit here and chafe under this character of outrage for years. But one of these great lights often, to show his magnanimity and his consideration for those members who by his selfishness have been deprived of an opportunity to say one word, arises and asks that unanimous consent be given to all members to print remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill, provided he does so in a limited time.

If a member is in possession of information common to all the members of the House, but not generally possessed by his constituents, I see no impropriety in his printing the same in the RECORD and sending it to his constituents, but if he has information, or can make an argument that might affect the judgment of members of this House, he ought to have time given him to address the members of the House, and not be forced to print a still-born speech in the RECORD and send it home to fool his constituents.

I want to strongly commend to all the great members of this House the conduct of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] here to day. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was not a member of the Committee on Census, but being a member of the inner circle and a gentleman of great ability and learning, as well as long service, the chairman gave him one hour. After a very able speech of an hour, some gentleman arose in his seat and asked that further time be given Mr. DALZELL, and the House granted the request, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania refused to take it, out of consideration to other gentlemen who had not had any time, who felt as much interest in this bill as did the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Such commendable conduct is not often witnessed in this House, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it was very refreshing. More than three hours was given certain gentlemen to advocate what is called the Crumpacker bill, designed to reduce the representation of certain Southern States on account of the alleged suppression of the negro vote. Living as I do in that section of our country and having that knowledge that comes by actual residence among the negroes of the South, I wished to give it to gentlemen from the North who do not have the same opportunity that I have for informing themselves on this grave and threatening question, but I must be denied, at least I was denied, the privilege of doing so.

Mr. Speaker, what good will it do these members from the North to print this information and send it home to my constituents, who know as much about it as I do? Will that enable them to vote intelligently on the Crumpacker bill?

I can see many good reasons why the popular branch of Congress should be a numerous body and grow with the growth of population, but if an increased House is to be used to further gag and muzzle the members of this House, I must content myself with voting against the enlargement of this House, if I am denied the privilege of giving my reasons for it more fully than I have herein.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. When I heard the speech of the gentleman from Illinois on Friday last, and his analysis of the so-called Burleigh bill, it disclosed so many inequalities in its operation that it seemed to me to be impossible for any fair-minded man to vote for it.

When I read the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] delivered on the following day, I found that, applying the same course of argument, he had disclosed the same inequalities under the operation of the bill proposed by the majority. I discovered upon a very little reflection what is admitted now on all sides, that, by applying the method of reasoning adopted by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Maine, any possible apportionment bill would disclose the same inequalities and that the doing of exact justice between all the States is impossible from the very nature of the case itself. And so I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who, with his accustomed logical instinct, has brought this debate to its real question and presented to us the real problem which is before us for solution.

The increase of the population of this country has compelled us to do one of two things—either to increase the size of the constituency or to increase the number of Representatives; and that choice is presented to us here to-day. Each course presents its own evils. The evils of adding 42,000 to each Congressional district, as is proposed by the bill of the majority, are manifold and manifest. Every man understands that from his daily experience; it is not necessary for me to dwell upon it. On the other hand, it is claimed that the increased size of the House tends to destroy the individuality of the Representative, his power of initiative, and to centralize the power of the House in the hands of the Speaker; that it tends to decrease the relative power of the House compared with the power of the Senate; that it destroys this Chamber as a forum for debate and deliberation.

I should like, if I had time, to spend a few moments on those claims. But what I have to say at this moment—and perhaps it is all that I can say—is that every one of those consequences predicted as the result of the passage of the Burleigh bill is here to-day. Those conditions will not be created by the passage of that bill. In my judgment they will not even be intensified by it. The power of the House under a natural development which brought the system of cabinet government in England into existence has taken the power of the Representatives and concentrated it in the hands of the Speaker and his immediate advisers. We might as well recognize the truth.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I have only five minutes, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman speaks of the concentration of power in England in the hands of a cabinet. Does he desire to see that condition of affairs in America?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I am not speaking of the desirability of the thing; I am speaking of the facts, which we understand and know.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania gave us some figures with regard to the amount of business which the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress and the Fifty-fifth Congress did in comparison with the body on the other side of the Capitol. I remember the Fifty-fourth Congress. I remember that when the Speaker of that Congress was selected in caucus, he stood by the side of that desk and said to us, "The Fifty-first Congress gained credit for what it did; the Fifty-fourth Congress will gain credit for what it does not do." And the first step in carrying out that programme was to debate for ten days an amendment offered to the pension appropriation bill, which was subject to a point of order and at the end of those ten days went out on the point of order, as everyone understood it would.

I remember that during the extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress we adjourned for three days at a time, week after week. We had the time, we had the opportunity, to do the business of the country; but I say that the Speaker and his advisers decided wisely and well, and in accordance with the judgment of the majority, when they declined to pass all the bills which came over here from the other end of the Capitol.

I say, then, that the evils which are present here, and which will not be intensified by the Burleigh bill, are evils that do not grow out of the numbers of this House. Say what you will, the House of Commons, with its membership of 670, has demonstrated that numbers do not prohibit an orderly conduct of public business. Who cares for a speech made in the House of Lords? A speech made in the House of Commons goes the world over. What is forbidding the orderly conduct of business on this floor? What is denying the right of each member to be effectively heard on this floor? What is preventing the deliberation——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] has expired.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. There are no roll calls in the British House of Commons such as we have here, are there?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not understand that there are. There are divisions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, is it not a fact that a large part of the time is taken up here by roll calls whenever there is any question that divides the members, either politically or sectionally?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. And is not that one of the conditions that operate against the British House of Commons being a precedent for us?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. One other question. Is it not a fact that in the British House of Commons 40 members constitute a quorum for the transaction of public business——

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. And 20 for private business?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That I am not so sure about. If the gentleman so states, no doubt he is right.

Mr. HOPKINS. And here, under our constitutional form of government, is it not a fact that there must be a majority of the members-elect present on every roll call for the transaction of business, if so demanded, whether it be public or private business?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That, Mr. Speaker, is the statement of an unquestionable fact; but in spite of all those things every man here knows I tell the truth when I say that there is no session of Congress when we do not waste time day after day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts has spoken of the importance of speeches made in the House of Commons.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the gentleman's judgment, how many members of the House of Commons in England speak upon the public questions of the day during an entire session of that body?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I suppose comparatively few members, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman think that twenty or twenty-five would limit the number of almost all the participants in debate in that body?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I can say that that statement would be true, both of the English House of Commons and the American House of Representatives. I believe that there are not more than 25 members who take an effective part in the debate here to-day under present conditions. I am not speaking of mere speeches, but of the debate which influences the judgment and action of the House.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will yield in a moment or two. Mr. Speaker, I was saying that all these evils—the denial of the right of individual action, the disorder which occurs in the House, the facts which make this a forum ill adapted to debate and deliberation—all come from other causes, and not because of members.

We can apply the remedy any day we choose. Let us close up, or at least contract, these pestilence-breeding galleries that exhaust the atmosphere and send us home every day the nearer to our death because we have worked in the Chamber. Let us contract the size of this Hall. Let us take out these desks. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are never at any one time more than 50 or 100 members interested in the discussion of a given question.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. There are more than 200 now.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. There are men in the English House of Commons, in the lobbies, ready to come in to vote, but very few present, I agree, in the ordinary deliberations, and that would be the fact here. If we adopt the remedy which I have proposed, and which has been discussed so many times, these evils would disappear.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In a single moment. If we do that, I say, these evils will disappear, and one of the reasons why I support the Burleigh bill, and support it earnestly, is because I believe its adoption will bring us nearer to the day of our deliverance. Now I yield, first to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask if in your comparison of the British Parliament to the Congress of the United States you have stopped to consider the fact that we have 45 State legislatures and 3 Territorial legislatures that are doing nine-tenths of the legislative business for the United States?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes, I have considered that fact. I did not refer to it. Of course, otherwise we could not do the business of the country.

Mr. HOPKINS. The question I was going to propound to my friend is this: Is it not a fact that in the English House of Commons all legislation is proposed by the Government?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It is. But, Mr. Speaker, it is equally a fact—and let us face things as we find them—it is equally a fact that our important legislation is proposed by the committees that guide this House. I do not find any fault with it. I believe it is the right system. I believe it is the only system. I believe it is as much evolved out of our conditions as cabinet government has been evolved out of the conditions in England.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to differ with my colleague from Massachusetts upon this important question. An important matter of this kind, it seems to me, should be free from partisanship or selfish interest, and I can not see any valid reason why the majority bill should not be accepted by the House.

Under the provisions of this bill, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, and Virginia lose a Representative, while Illinois, Louisiana, Minnesota, New Jersey, and New York gain 1 and Texas 2 Representatives.

If any member of this House can show any political advantage to either party in this arrangement, I would like to see it pointed out. The apportionment is based upon the census figures of the present year, and makes the present membership of the House as the basis upon which the figuring is done.

The result shows that some States have increased their population more than others, and therefore get better results. This is to be expected, and if certain sections of this country do not keep up with the pace the country is setting they must expect to fall behind, not only in the matter of representation in this House, but in all worldly affairs.

I regret to see the spirit in which this great question is approached by many members of this body. I have been solicited by a great many members to vote for the Burleigh bill, not because it was a good bill for the country at large, but because it favored their particular State or locality. It is a species of logrolling that I regret to see taking place in this body. I think the House of Representatives of the United States ought to approach this great question with an eye to the general welfare of the country rather than with a view to favor any particular section of the country.

We ought to be above the small and narrow policies that govern legislative bodies where selfish interests prevail, and consider this proposition in a broad, intelligent, and honest public spirit. If this course is pursued, I think the wisdom and good sense of the House will defeat the proposition to increase the membership of the House 29 members, as provided in the Burleigh bill.

I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague's attack upon the Rules of the House. He cited all manner of abuses, and I agree with him in every detail. Does he think, however, that these abuses can be remedied by increasing the membership of this body? Will not the 29 new members which are added, if the proposition which he advocates goes through, make it harder to obtain the ear of the House than it is at the present time?

Every member of this House knows that under the present rules and practice of this body debate upon many measures is farcical. I have known questions of the greatest importance to the people of this country to be shut off with one hour's debate in this Chamber. No matter how important the matter may be that is up for discussion, it is very seldom that more than two days is given for its consideration. How can 357 men discuss intelligently a proposition that remains before them but ten hours? I have witnessed time and time again since I have been a member of this body men pleading and urging for two, three, and five minutes' time to discuss a matter of interest to their constituency and this country. The majority are too arbitrary. More time could be given to public discussion of great matters if the spirit of fair play animated the other side of the House.

If my colleague complains of the abuses that exist, why not remedy them in a proper manner. He is a member of the majority. He voted for the rules that make possible these abuses. Why not display the old spirit that dominated the men from Massachusetts in the days gone by and force your party to give fair play and honorable treatment to the people's Representatives in this great branch of the public service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The remedy lies in the radical revision of the rules of this House and not in an increased membership.

An addition of 29 members to this body means added confusion and an increased expense to the Government of $200,000, at least. It means the additional trouble of providing committee places for these men, in face of the fact that as Mr. Dalzell of Pennsylvania said this morning, 15 committees had been organized, not for the purpose of doing business, because they never met, but in order to furnish a proper share of committee appointments for each member of the House.

Under the Burleigh bill, Maine gets 4 Representatives for her population of 694,466, an average of 173,616 for each Representative. Massachusetts, with a population of 2,805,346, gets but 14 Representatives under the Burleigh bill when she is entitled to, using 173,616 as a basis of population for each Representative, 16 Representatives. How can my colleagues from Massachusetts vote for a proposition so manifestly unfair to that State? Why are not 173,616 people in Massachusetts entitled to a Representative in the House as well as a similar number in the State of Maine? Under the Burleigh bill Massachusetts has a fraction of 100,896, more than one-half of the number entitling her to an additional Representative. Major fractions do not seem to count in her case, however. The same is true of Iowa, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, all of which have these fractions and none of which receive any consideration on that account in the Burleigh bill. This bill, to be just and fair to all the States, should include another Representative for each of these States.

I call these matters to the attention of the House because those advocating the enactment of the Burleigh bill have stated that one of the reasons for the enlargement of the House was to take care of the States with the majority fractions, which receive no consideration in the Hopkins bill.

I understand that the great Republican bosses of the country have taken a hand in this matter and have given orders that the Burleigh bill must pass. Senators HANNA, PLATT, Quay, LODGE, and FAIRBANKS, I understand, have instructed the members from their respective States to vote for the Burleigh bill, and it will be interesting to watch the vote on that account.

Members of the present Congress, as well as those of the former Congresses, since clerks have been authorized for the members of the House, do not do near the personal work that has been done by members of Congress in former days. During the past four Congresses, I believe, an appropriation of $100 per month has been made from the public Treasury for a clerk for each member of the House. This takes a tremendous load and responsibility from every member, and it must be admitted by every member of this body that most of the work done at the Departments, and practically all the correspondence formerly attended to by the members of Congress themselves, is now performed by these clerks.

For this reason it seems to me that members of Congress are better able to attend to the interests of 200,000 persons now than they were years ago, when the average constituency consisted of about half that number. Some members here have advanced the argument that the public business is increasing to such an extent that more members are required to look after it. How do the men who advance this argument harmonize it with the fact that 2 Senators look out for practically the same amount of public business as 10, 20, and in some cases 30 members of Congress? The same matters are considered in both branches.

I think, Mr. Speaker, on the whole, that the House of Representatives has as large a membership at the present time as is consistent with the prompt and orderly dispatch of the public business. I think the people of the United States ought not to be compelled to submit to the additional tax levied upon them by this increase in membership just to further the political ambition of a few men. The time has come, it seems to me, when the members of this Congress should look upon the question from a broad, public-spirited standpoint, and if this is done the House will indorse the bill which has been submitted by the majority of the committee.

Before taking my seat I wish to refer to another matter that has been discussed upon this floor in connection with the apportionment bill. The question of the disfranchisement of the negro vote in certain of the Southern States has given rise to some heated discussions upon this subject. I do not intend to discuss the question at this time, other than to say that I am absolutely opposed to any discrimination on account of race, color, or religion, and also to add that the gentlemen who have stated upon the floor of this House that the Massachusetts statute relating to the qualifications of voters had been copied and was analogous to the statutes in the Southern States where the negroes were disfranchised is not true. I will quote the language of the Massachusetts statute on this question:

> Every male citizen 21 years of age or upward, not being a pauper or person under guardianship, who is able to read the constitution of the Commonwealth in the English language and to write his name, and who has resided within the Commonwealth one year and within the city or town in which he claims the right to vote six calendar months next preceding a State, city, or town election, may have his name entered upon the list of voters in such city or town and shall have the right to vote therein at any such election.

The rest of the section is merely explanatory, and as I have only a moment's time I will not occupy it by quoting further in the section. I might add that a further provision of this section makes an exception of persons who are prevented from reading and writing by physical disability or who had the right to vote on the 1st day of May in the year 1857.

During the debate upon this question in the past two days I have seen the statement quoted repeatedly as coming from members of this House that the statutes of the Southern States followed the lines of the Massachusetts statute, and I take this opportunity of informing the House that the election laws of Massachusetts apply to all classes of citizens alike, and make no distinction between black and white or in favor of or against those of any race or religious belief. Every man, except paupers and insane persons, in Massachusetts is placed upon an equality in this matter and can only enjoy suffrage when he complies with the general law.

In the South, as I understand the law, men who are not able to read and write, but whose father or grandfather voted in 1867, and in some States ancestors more remote than these, are allowed to vote. This is a clear distinction made against the negro, because every intelligent person in the United States knows that no negroes in the South were eligible to vote in 1867.

I am proud to say upon the floor of this House that the laws of Massachusetts in this respect are fair and just to all the inhabitants of the Commonwealth; that the black man is entitled and receives the same consideration that the white man does, and that the people of that State would not tolerate for one moment any law upon the statute books which would make any distinction against the men of any race or extend favors to any particular class of people.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Are not those paupers excepted who have served in the Army in the Massachusetts law?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Any person who has served in the Army or Navy and becomes a pauper is excepted.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Then all are not entitled to vote?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Paupers and the insane are not entitled to vote.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I say if they have served in the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Paupers, if they have served in the Army or Navy, are entitled to vote, as I understand the law.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Why did you not read it all?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I read as far as I could. I did not have time to read further. That is why I am arguing against increasing the size of the House. We should have more time in order to explain things. If we increase the House 29 members now, ten years from now as many more will be added. Now, we can not lengthen the session so as to sit here all year. The members of Congress will not stay in Washington in the summer time; and ten years from now, when the House consists of 415 members, what is now bedlam will be chaos and bedlam combined.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I have never sympathized with the great hue and cry that is raised in a great many sections of the country against the black man. He has a soul, a heart, and a conscience. I have observed them under many conditions in my native State, as well as here in Washington, and taking them all in all I have found them a faithful and deserving people.

They stand ready to fight our battles. They are willing and anxious to deserve the good opinion of the white people of this country.

We are all proud of the record of the black regiments in the Spanish-American war, and if the white soldier boys whose lives were saved on San Juan Hill and at El Caney by the heroic and dare-devil work of the black-skinned men who, with gleaming eyeballs and shining teeth, rushed to the assistance of the Rough Riders were here to speak I think they would protest with mighty vigor against the disfranchisement of a race that produced such brave and noble souls. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment offered by Mr. BURLEIGH as follows:
In lines 2 and 3 strike out "86" and insert "95;" also, after "Alabama" strike out "9" and insert "10;" after "Georgia" strike out "11" and insert "12;" after "Iowa" strike out "11" and insert "12;" after "Massachusetts" strike out "14" and insert "15;" after "Michigan" strike out "12" and insert "13;" after "New York" strike out "37" and insert "38;" after "Ohio" strike out "21" and insert "22;" after "Pennsylvania" strike out "32" and insert "33;" after "Tennessee" strike out "10" and insert "11."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the plan proposed by me and offered as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] fixes the membership of the House at 395, thus increasing the membership 38. This additional number gives to the States additional representation in proportion to their growth and population. Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Tennessee, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, each gaining 1 Representative, while Massachusetts, Minnesota, and New Jersey each gain 2 Representatives. Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Texas each gain 3 Representatives, and New York makes a gain of 4 Representatives. This is fair and just to all sections of our country.

It is not based upon party advantage, but gives the States named the advantage to which they are fairly and justly entitled. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this is the only equitable apportionment that I can suggest within reason; while the report of the minority is conceived in selfishness, based upon expediency, and will be sustained, if at all, by the votes of members actuated by personal friendship for the sitting members, who would be more or less affected by the adoption of the majority report and reduced representation.

Mr. Speaker, we are performing a solemn constitutional function to-day, and I am firmly of the opinion that it ought to be along such lines as are fair and just to all sections of the country. We boast of our vast increase of population, and of the numerical strength of our country. Why not let the measure of representation in this great popular assembly, where the rights of the people are safeguarded, go hand in hand with the growth and accumulating strength of the nation? In my judgment it was not contemplated by the fathers of the Republic that one Representative should do the work at this Capitol of a constituency composed in many cases of 250,000 people.

In fact, I do not believe that it is either proper or right to thus limit the people, who can only be heard in a representative capacity. Some of the districts in the State of Michigan are empires in resources, territory, and population. It is impossible for a member of Congress representing a large district to keep in touch with his people, to study their needs, and to perform the service required of him daily in a satisfactory manner. This is not representative government. This is not the plan originally intended.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to interrupt the gentleman if he will permit me.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I must decline to yield, as I have only five minutes. I would make the representation in this body as close to the people and as direct as possible. There is no good argument that can be advanced against increasing the membership of this House. I do not see a single difficulty attending a fair increase of membership. That does not exist to-day. When I first came here I thought that the rules were oppressive. I did not believe that they were necessary.

After six years of service I do no know how the business of the country can be transacted unless each member is willing to yield some of his rights as a member in the interests of the nation, and give right of way to the more important measures affecting the nation as a whole, and I have not a criticism to make upon the present administration of the rules, although I feel at times that they are not quite as elastic as the conditions of the situation demand.

But, sir, I do not feel that we have met the present emergency broadly and fairly if we do not recognize those sections of our country whose growth and importance fairly entitle them to increased representation. The State of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent in part, has increased during the last decade from 1,602,474 to 2,420,000 under the census just completed, an increase of 817,526. This, Mr. Speaker, is a tribute to our strength and attractiveness as a State. This record fairly entitles the State of Michigan to increased representation in this body and in the electoral college when the destiny of our country is so often at stake. Before Maine is entitled to 4 Representatives upon this floor, Michigan is entitled to 13 members upon this floor, even upon the basis proposed by the minority report, and upon the united request of the delegation from the State of Michigan I protest against this inequality and injustice, and urge the House to go one step further, fixing the membership at 395—the only just and fair increase that can properly be made.

The country will approve a just solution of this question, and they will stamp with their condemnation any course, born of mere expediency, which deals out Congressional representation according favor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I desire to know if this amendment is on the same ratio and on the same proportion as the Burleigh bill, and provides that no State shall lose its Representative?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. My amendment provides for all the States, and that no State shall lose any of its Representatives; and gives additional representation to those States that have grown in population and strength which entitles them to favor under the last census.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of reenforcing, as far as I may in a few minutes, the manifest justice of the amendment now before the House, offered by the gentleman from North Dakota, an amendment for the purpose of giving an additional Representative to the State of Florida, one to the State of North Dakota, and one to the State of Colorado. I think, Mr. Speaker, it comes with bad grace from the gentleman from South Carolina, who is one of the signers of the minority report now before the House, to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota, because I find this written in the minority report, signed by that gentleman, together with his colleagues:

The anomalous character of this proposed apportionment, as well as its obvious injustice, is clearly demonstrated by the fact that it is necessarily based, in part, upon majority fractions, and yet Colorado with a majority fraction of 121,367, Florida with a majority fraction of 110,807, and North Dakota with a majority fraction of 105,586 do not receive a Representative based upon such majority fraction, while every other State with a majority fraction receives a Representative for such majority fraction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what bill will pass the House; but if the Hopkins bill does become law, then it would be a law of manifest injustice, unless these three States each had a Representative to represent its majority fraction, because all the other States with a majority fraction have each a Representative.

Mr. Speaker, the confusion of ideas manifested in the discussion grows out of the fact that gentlemen take the present membership of the House as the permanent or ultimate divisor. It is not right. The present membership, 357, ought to be taken as a trial divisor, for the purpose of arriving at the true divisor, and the true divisor is the number of people which it takes to make a Representative upon the floor.

Now, when you divide the true divisor into the population of each State—and of course it is the people of each State which is represented and not the people of the United States at large—then you get an answer, and that answer is the number of Representatives to which that State is entitled. But there is always left over a fraction, and you must approximate the true representation by representing the fraction or not representing it. It has been universally agreed that the best approximation to actual and true justice is to let the fraction under one-half go unrepresented and the fraction over one-half go represented.

So that in taking your trial divisor—the present number of the House, or any other number you please—you do not use the true membership of the House; you merely try it and you always get as the true membership something a little over the trial divisor which you use. And so in this case, you would finally arrive at the true membership of 360 upon the basis of the number of Representatives, two hundred and eight thousand eight hundred and something, which you require for each Representative.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I desire to say, but before I sit down I want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] for having read the Massachusetts constitution—that part of it from which we copied in Mississippi the provision which now stands as it does in our constitution. He read it for the purpose of showing that it was not analogous, but his reading proved that it was identical.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. In what part of the Massachusetts constitution or laws is the phrase which makes an exception of those whose father or grandfather was entitled to vote in 1867?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No part of it at all. Nor is there any such provision in the constitution of Mississippi. I said the part of the Massachusetts constitution that you read was copied into the Mississippi constitution. I did not say there was not anything in the Mississippi constitution except what you had up there; of course not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I am glad to have the gentleman make that admission. I am certain that he does not wish to give the impression that the laws of Massachusetts in the matter of voting create any distinction between blacks and whites. It is not true, and I wish the House and the country to know that the election laws of Massachusetts apply with equal force to all classes of citizens.

The illiterate white, except those who voted previous to 1857, and they number very, very few at the present time, has no more right to vote than the illiterate black.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I find with much regret that on this bill I differ with my colleagues, with whom I ordinarily act in concert, and as I can not convince myself that I am wrong, I wish to state my reasons for voting against the Burleigh bill. If it were merely a question of gratifying the sensibilities or pride of the State of Maine, or of doing a favor to the most able men who represent her now, no man would go further to do it than I, although it does seem to me that just now that State is in a rare condition to accept gracefully that reduction of representation which is always likely to come to any of the older States, because to-day Maine is practically represented here by three men, and last fall one of her districts, by a very unique and extraordinary exhibition of gratitude for faithful and distinguished service, which I am sure we all admire, nominated and elected a hopeless invalid, so that, for at least three sessions, Maine would have had only three members on this floor, if we had not relieved her by a special bill for that most deserving statesman, though in doing it we all felt we were setting a very vicious precedent.

But kindness or even fairness to the State of Maine or to any other particular State is not the issue. It has been abundantly proved that mathematics can not determine any apportionment which shall be universally fair and equal. Some must fare better than others, and I wish I could vote as the Burleigh bill provides, that no State should fare better than the State of Maine. But there is one question which to my mind is controlling, and that is, is not the membership of this House already so large that any increase will reduce the individual influence and usefulness of the members, and also reduce the influence of this branch of Congress? I am very thoroughly convinced that this House is already quite as large as it should be. This objection was obvious to the defenders of the Burleigh bill, but they have met it by arguments quite inconsistent with each other.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] argued that the House was not too large now for the orderly transaction of business, and he said a plan had been prepared for putting 30 new seats in this Chamber, so that it would be just as convenient as to-day. I think he is mistaken. I have not drawn a seat in the back row three Congresses out of four without learning that there are many seats where it is impossible to either hear or engage in debate.

My colleague [Mr. MOODY] differs from Mr. LITTLEFIELD, although supporting his bill, and he says the House is too big already, in which I agree with him; but he develops the extraordinary argument that this House is too big to-day, that some remedy is necessary, but that the members do not yet recognize the need of a remedy, and therefore to drive them to that remedy he would make the House bigger yet.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague does not intend to misrepresent me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. My position was not that the House was too large, but too large under the present conditions.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly. I did not express myself clearly, because I used the word House both for this Chamber and for the body. My colleague argues that in this Chamber the present membership can not properly conduct business. Then the gentleman from Maine, arguing on the same side, entirely disagrees with him. But what does my colleague suggest as a remedy? He says, increase the membership of this body. Then conditions here will be so bad that some change will have to be made, and he hopes that then a majority will agree with him that this Chamber should be greatly reduced, and that we should imitate the English House of Commons.

There are two objections to my colleague's argument. In the first place we have no assurance that what he considers the panacea—a reduction of the size of the Chamber—would ever be adopted, and if it were not, conditions would be vastly worse; the present confusion would be "worse confounded." Our most forceful Speaker in the last Congress attempted to have the experiment tried, but even his autocratic influence could not succeed; and I am afraid that the increment of 30 more seats would not drive the members to abandon their desks. But I do not think my colleague was happy in his comparison to the House of Commons. I think the conditions there are just what we want to avoid, and illustrate clearly the danger in any material increase of membership.

There the whole business of the House is in the hands of a very few men. A large part of the members take no part in the proceedings, seldom appear except to hear an exciting debate or vote in an important division, have no individual sense of responsibility, but trust to the party whip. I think that would be the necessary tendency here if the membership were increased, and that is just what we ought to aim to avoid. Why, in the House of Commons a whole political party of nearly a hundred is absenting itself by concerted action. Do we want such a sense of duty to exist here?

There is already a tendency here, which has occasioned much restiveness, to concentrate the power in a few hands; to allow a small number of leaders to manage business. Do we want that increased? I think not. Yet an increase of numbers must surely increase it.

The philosophical statement of Hamilton, quoted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], that the larger an assembly the fewer men will guide it, is still true, and if we increase membership we must still more centralize power and influence. I think true progress is in the opposite direction. I think we should increase the size of the constituencies rather than of Congress. And I think in that way we shall maintain not only the individual influence of the members but the influence of this body. One of the most striking and mischievous tendencies to-day is the increasing power of the Senate compared with the House, and just so much as we increase and dilute our membership so do we decrease our relative influence. For these reasons, although the Burleigh bill benefits my section, although there are personal associations which make it unpleasant for me to oppose it, yet I have been unable to combat my deep conviction that this House is already quite large enough and ought not to be increased. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the first proposition.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is as follows: The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] offers a substitute for the first section. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] offers an amendment to the Burleigh substitute. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SPALDING] offers an amendment to the first section, and the first question will be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota, which seeks to perfect the first section of the bill.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SPALDING].

Mr. BINGHAM. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be again read, if there be no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there are no other amendments to the first section, the question will now be upon the amendment offered to "the Burleigh bill"—the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH]. Without objection, that amendment will again be reported for the information of the House.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. CORLISS)—ayes 85, noes 136.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. BURLEIGH and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 166, nays 102, answered "present" 10, not voting 77; as follows:

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MEYER of Louisiana, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State is admitted to the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be in addition to the number 357.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment that I want to offer to that section.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before that is offered, I will ask my friend from Missouri to yield for a moment, until the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] can offer an amendment to make this section conform to the preceding section.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will withdraw it, but I do not want to lose my place.

Mr. HOPKINS. You shall have it.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee desires the gentleman from Kansas to offer the amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I move to strike out "fifty-seven," at the close of the section, and insert "eighty-six," so as to conform to the first section of the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, section 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "eighty-six."

The SPEAKER. This makes it conform to the action just taken by the House?

Mr. LONG. It does.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding the following words:

"That the District of Columbia is hereby created a Territory by the name of the Territory of Columbia.

"SEC. 2. That all male citizens of said Territory over 21 years of age who have not been convicted of a felony and who have resided within said District one whole year prior to the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, A. D. 1902, are qualified electors to vote for all Territorial officers and upon all Territorial questions.

"SEC. 3. That the existing District government shall continue until January 1, 1903, and the laws now in force shall continue in force until changed or repealed by the Territorial legislature.

"SEC. 4. That prior to January 1, 1903, the President of the United States shall appoint a governor, secretary, and marshal for said Territory from among the qualified voters thereof, who shall hold their offices for a term of four years from said 1st day of January, A. D. 1903, unless sooner removed for good and sufficient cause.

"SEC. 5. That the legislature of said Territory shall consist of a senate and house of representatives. The senate shall be composed of 11 members, who shall be qualified voters of said Territory at least 30 years of age, whose term shall be four years. The house shall be composed of 22 members, who shall be qualified voters at least 25 years old, and whose term shall be two years.

"SEC. 6. That the said Territory shall be entitled to a Delegate to the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the present Commissioners of the District forthwith to divide the said Territory into 11 legislative districts, as nearly equal in population as possible, each of which shall be entitled to 1 senator and 2 representatives in the Territorial legislature.

"SEC. 8. That on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1902, an election shall be held within said Territory for the purpose of electing senators and representatives in said Territorial legislature and a Delegate to the Congress of the United States.

"SEC. 9. That it is hereby made the duty of said Commissioners to provide polling booths, poll books, tally sheets, printed ballots, and other appliances necessary for said election, and to appoint judges and clerks for the same in such numbers as to them shall seem best: Provided, however, That not more than one-half of such judges and clerks shall be appointed from one political party.

"SEC. 10. That election returns shall be certified to said Commissioners, and they shall canvass the same and issue certificates of election to those elected.

"SEC. 11. That each house of said legislature shall be the sole judge of the election and qualification of its members.

"SEC. 12. That at high noon, January 1, 1903, both houses of said legislature shall meet at places prepared by said Commissioners and shall organize for business by electing such officers as shall be necessary, and may continue in session for ninety days, and no more.

"SEC. 13. That senators and representatives in said legislature shall receive $10 per day during the session, to be paid out of the revenues of said Territory.

"SEC. 14. That said legislature shall have power to enact all necessary laws, to levy taxes, to disburse the revenues, to do all things usually done by Territorial legislatures, and to provide for the election and appointment of all subordinate officers, and to fix their compensation."

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. HOPKINS said: Mr. Speaker, enough of that has been read to indicate that it is clearly objectionable. I make the point of order against it that it is not germane to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have the right to have that read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained; but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri if he desires.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to have that read in my time. I believe I am entitled to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. It can not be done now except by unanimous consent. It is out of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the House, then, that the amendment be published in the RECORD, and I desire to state the substance of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this amendment be published in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I want five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the part of that amendment that is pertinent to this bill is to give the District of Columbia a Delegate to sit in this House. Ever since I came here I have been in favor of that proposition, and all I have witnessed confirms me in that opinion.

It is a disgrace and reproach to the American Republic that right here under the shadow of the Dome of this Capitol 300,000 people, white, black, yellow, and copper-colored, are absolutely disfranchised and have no more voice in their own Government than if they were so many Digger Indians. The only objection that I have ever heard to my proposition was the statement of some fine-haired solar-walk citizens of this city that "if the right of franchise were restored to these people the poor whites and damned niggers would vote them into bankruptcy." That is a very strange statement to be made in this city—the finest capital in the world.

You can not walk 300 yards in this city without seeing the effigy of either Andrew Jackson or of Abraham Lincoln. To say that poor whites are dangerous voters in this country, which holds up those two illustrious men, sprung from the poorest of poor whites, as exemplars of American manhood is absolutely preposterous. A wag out in Missouri told me that when Andrew Johnson was sworn in as Vice-President, in looking up at the Senate diplomatic gallery, he happened to catch sight of the representatives of the foreign governments up there, and, shaking his fist at them, said: "You aristocratic cockadoodles, go back to your royal masters and tell them that in the land of the setting sun you saw a tailor and a rail splitter climb to the apex of human power." [Laughter.] That is a gorgeous sentence—a patriotic sentiment.

Whether he ever said it I do not know. However that may be, it was worthy to be said, because in that idea is the genius of our institutions. And I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if a "nigger" is good enough to vote against me in the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri, he is good enough to elect a Representative for the city of Washington to sit on this floor. [Applause.]

We have always professed that we are in favor of "home rule." Our desire to see the Cubans have home rule lay at the root of the Spanish war. We are all in favor of home rule for Ireland, and a vast majority of the American people, irrespective of party affiliations, wish to see the brave, heroic Boers win in their unparalleled fight for home rule. Yet, with persistency which is amazing and inconsistency which is enigmatical, we refuse to grant the precious boon of home rule to our own fellow-citizens at our very doors. It is not only an anomaly in our system of government; it is an anomaly in human nature.

I do not believe that the people of this District are unfit for self-government. They have a fine opportunity for educating themselves in that difficult art. They hear more politics and talk more politics than the people of any other portion of the Republic. Things are always happening here to incite their patriotic fervor. The monuments of our achievements and our greatness are all about them. The visible evidences of our power are forever before their eyes. The glorious traditions and fascinating legends of American worthies who have passed into history are familiar to their ears. The numberless blessings of our free institutions are known to them. To say that they are unfit to govern themselves is to confess that our experiment in representative government is a colossal failure.

Mr. Speaker, you may rule this bill out of order now, but if I sit in this House long enough, I intend to bring this bill here in a way that it will have ample discussion, and whenever it does I will drive the Republican majority of this House into taking the position openly on this floor that the negroes are not fit to vote at all, because that is the idea that they have in disfranchising the people of the District of Columbia, though, for political reasons, they dare not avow it. And in this connection I have only one wish, and that is to be in this city on the day that they elect the first Delegate to sit in the American Congress.

There would be 500 candidates at the least calculation. It would be a battle royal, to witness which would be worth ten years of peaceful life; and it is the saddest commentary ever made on free government that we sit here and refuse to these people the right to govern themselves—to indulge in the luxury of voting and being voted for. A gentleman said to me the other day that this was the best governed city on the continent, when I was talking to him about this bill. Suppose it is. Every city has a right to govern itself as it pleases. If it wants to let the hoodlums run it, all well. The only reason that the hoodlums run any town on the American continent is that the fine-haired people, the self-styled "better classes," think they are better than other people. They are unwilling to be jostled by a hoodlum on the day of election.

Mr. KLUTTZ. The mugwumps?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, the mugwumps, or jugwumps, as Sam Jones calls them. These fine-haired people are too good to discharge their political duties. They stay at home in idleness, clothed in his mantle of self-righteousness, while the hoodlum discharges not only his own political duty, but also the political duty of the fine-haired citizen. I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, and it is the last I have to say about it at present, that you can rule this amendment out of order now, but the day will come when this bill will be, must be, considered here. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment, the number to which such State may be entitled in the Fifty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. The said districts shall be equal to the number of the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

The following committee amendment was read:

In line 16, after the word "contiguous," insert the words "and compact."

The SPEAKER. This is a committee amendment.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I demand to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is a committee amendment pending.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I understand that there is a committee amendment pending, and I merely offer the formal amendment for the purpose of making an opportunity to record my objection to this kind of legislation on apportionment bills. The only power the House has is to fix the apportionment and the number of Representatives to which the several States are entitled. Congress has no power to say how the districts shall be laid off, whether in contiguous territory or of as nearly equal population as practicable; that duty rests upon the States, and upon them alone.

The right to declare that Congressional districts shall be laid off out of contiguous territory and of as nearly equal population as practicable implies, of course, the power to revise any infraction of the law; and the power to revise implies the power to initiate, and would give to Congress the right to lay off into districts all the States of the Union. This, it seems to me, is too monstrous a doctrine to be for a moment tolerable.

I know that for fifty years such provisions as these have been incorporated in apportionment bills, but no State has ever permitted itself to be bound by them.

Since such legislation has always been nugatory, I attach no especial importance to this effort, and it is hardly worth while wasting the time of the House at this late hour in endeavoring to convince it of the invalidity of these sections.

Having, however, recorded my objections to them as unconstitutional and void, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that in this era of good feeling and in the first month of the new century the passions and prejudices engendered by the civil war, now happily more than a third of a century behind us, had been forever buried. I had hoped that no legislation would be suggested or proposed in this House that would even tend to revive that feeling of bitterness or to reopen those old wounds. I had hoped that the spirit of harmony and good will between the North and the South, so earnestly advocated by President McKinley on several notable occasions, would be permitted to flow on without interruption, "yielding the peaceable fruits of righteousness."

I am glad of the assurance that the President, in the kindness of his heart and the generous disposition which animates him, is now opposed to any such punitive legislation as that embodied in what is known as the "Crumpacker bill," proposing to arbitrarily strike down a part of the representation on this floor of four sovereign States of the Union because those States are unwilling that the pure, honest, intelligent administration of their local government shall be again jeopardized by the rule of vice, corruption, and ignorance.

Having drunk to its dregs this bitter cup during the dark days of the reconstruction period, we never intend to swallow it again, and there is no power on earth that can make us do it. Our brethren of the North do not understand the conditions which confront us, nor can they have any reasonable conception of the horrors of carpetbag rule as it existed in Mississippi and other Southern States from 1869 to 1876. Big-brained, big-hearted old Horace Greeley, from his tripod in the Tribune office, could not believe that the half that was told was true until he visited the South and satisfied himself; and when he returned home he wrote the historic words, "I found the carpetbagger a mournful fact."

Many other conservative Republicans, some of whom I am glad to find occupying seats upon this floor and in the other end of the Capitol, have, like Horace Greeley, investigated for themselves, and now freely admit that in several of the Southern States the overshadowing and impending peril is negro supremacy, which means a destruction of all the highest and best interests of the people of those States; and I have confidence that when the test is applied they will have the courage of their convictions, rise above passion and prejudice, and, instead of viewing the matter from the standpoint of mere partisan advantage, look at it in the light of broad statesmanship and justice to a long-suffering people who are to-day as loyal to the flag of a reunited country as those of any State in this great Republic.

I come from a proud State. I love her people and all their interests. I love her hills and her valleys, her murmuring rills and her rolling rivers, and her mighty "Father of Waters," upon whose majestic bosom is borne the commerce of half a continent. No braver men nor fairer women dwell beneath the shining sun than are to be found in Mississippi. During the fateful days from 1861 to 1865 her sons illustrated their heroism upon a hundred bloody fields, and the devotion of her women in those perilous times has never been surpassed in the annals of history. But when the war was ended we accepted in good faith the arbitrament of arms, and if anything was wanting to prove the loyalty of the Southern people, I need only to refer to what has passed into history during the last two years.

Men who wore the gray so proudly and valiantly in 1861 have been found fighting under the flag of the Union. Sons of the men who wrote the brightest pages in the martial history of the world freely enlisted under the banner of a reunited country, ready to dare, to do, and to die for the honor and glory of the great Republic; and some of the richest blood of the South has been poured out upon the decks of our battle ships and upon sanguinary fields, and to-day wherever our armies are found confronting an enemy there sons of the South vie with their Northern brothers in deeds of heroism and patriotic duty.

We of the South have a problem to solve, the gravest that ever confronted a proud-spirited people, and all that we ask is to be let alone in our efforts to work it out, and in God's own time, guided by enlightened statesmanship and the spirit of the Divine Master, we will solve it to the mutual advantage and satisfaction of both races. The Crumpacker bill proposes to take from the State of Louisiana 2 of her present Representatives in Congress, reducing her from 6 to 4; from Mississippi 3, reducing her from 7 to 4; from North Carolina 4, reducing her from 9 to 5, and from South Carolina 3, reducing her from 7 to 4, and at the same time increasing the representation of other States so as to make the membership of the House 365 instead of 357, as now constituted.

And why is it sought to thus degrade and dishonor these four proscribed Southern States? Solely because they have, by constitutional amendments, endeavored to protect themselves against the possible danger of a return to power of the vicious and ignorant elements in our midst and open the door to another flock of foul birds of prey like those which feasted and fattened upon the substance of our people in the reconstruction period.

In the further discussion of this subject, Mr. Speaker, I shall confine myself to the conditions in Mississippi, and to showing the fallacies of the arguments which have been employed by gentlemen who favor this repressive legislation. Some of these are so manifestly without solid foundation that I can only believe they are the result of want of information. I do not charge them with intentional unfairness, but whether with deliberate purpose or from want of information, the effect is the same if allowed to go unchallenged.

These gentlemen have made the Congressional vote in 1898 the basis of a charge that an enormous percentage of our people are disfranchised and a test of the number of qualified voters in the State of Mississippi. If gentlemen had taken the pains to inform themselves, they must have learned that they reasoned from absurdly false premises. They would have learned that several causes combined to record so small a vote in that year. In the first place, in Mississippi we have a primary-election law under which most nominations are made, and after this has been done, there being practically no opposition in the general election, there is no inducement to a full vote; and this applies to all our elections, whether State or Federal.

In the second place, we have quadrennial elections for all State, district, and county officers, and these elections are wholly divorced from Federal elections and never occur in the same year, so that every four years we have an election for members of Congress alone. This was the case in 1898, and there was nothing to call out a full vote. As a matter of fact, only about one-sixth of the registered vote was polled. As an illustration, which will hold good throughout the State, the registration books showed in the district which I have the honor to represent that in the 9 counties composing that district, as I get it from the report of the secretary of state made to the legislature in 1897, there were 18,450 registered voters, whereas in the Congressional election of 1898 there were polled only 3,174.

Therefore it is not only untrue but utterly without foundation in fact that this light vote has any bearing upon the question of disfranchisement, when there were more than 15,000 registered voters in the district who did not avail themselves of the right to vote. How many failed to register for reasons similar to those which prompted the 15,000 who were registered to decline to vote we have no means of ascertaining, but undoubtedly a large number. It does not cost a man anything to register in Mississippi, except the time it takes to go to his voting place and meet the county registrar, who is required by law to attend at such place on appointed and published days for the purpose of adding the names of those who desire to register.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, the vote for different candidates at the same election varies. For instance, in the Presidential year of 1896 the vote for electors was 69,513, while the Congressional vote on the same day was only 66,285.

In 1900 the Presidential vote was a little more than 59,000, while the Congressional vote, by districts, was only 51,238, a difference of nearly 8,000 votes on the same day.

In 1892 the first Presidential election after the adoption of our present constitution, which has been so vigorously and unfairly assailed upon this floor, was held, and the vote for electors was only 52,809, and four years later, in 1896, as I have before stated, it was 69,513, an increase of nearly 13,000 votes.

To show again the fallacy of the arguments of these gentlemen, I will present some figures on our State elections for a number of years.

In the last State election before the beginning of the reconstruction period, which was held in 1865, Gen. B. G. Humphries, a gallant, maimed ex-Confederate soldier whom everybody loved, was the Democratic candidate for governor, and there was only a total of 41,880 votes polled. In 1869, when the first election was held after the enfranchisment of the negro, Gen. James L. Alcorn, a "home Republican," and a man of decided ability and some conservatism, was the candidate of the Republican party, and Louis Dent, a brother-in-law of General Grant, was the candidate adopted by the Democrats. In this election there was a total of 114,784 votes polled. In 1873, General Ames, late of the United States Army, who had been sent there as military governor and decided to remain and dip his oar into the murky pool of politics, was the nominee of the carpetbag fraternity, of which he was then a most conspicuous member, while Governor Alcorn, who had become thoroughly disgusted with carpetbag methods, was a candidate for reelection and was supported by most of the Democrats and a few conservative Republicans.

In this election there were polled 110,857 votes, a loss, as compared with the election of 1869, of nearly 4,000. Alcorn was defeated by about 19,000 votes. I will stop here to say that this fight of Governor Alcorn against Ames and his carpetbag lieutenants was the entering wedge toward the destruction of the power of the gang of robbers who were holding high carnival in offices in which many of them were not fit to serve as janitors. Governor Alcorn retired to his plantation, but in 1890 was called by the people of his county to serve in the convention which framed our present constitution and supported and voted for it as it stands to-day.

With the election of Ames in 1873 there was inaugurated the darkest period of two years that Mississippi ever knew. Flushed with victory, mad with power, and with an overwhelming majority in the legislature composed of ignorant negroes, unscrupulous carpetbaggers, and a sprinkling of "scallawags"—a name applied to native white Republicans who joined hands with this detestable conglomeration—they reveled in excesses and burdensome legislation as if determined to reduce the white property owners and taxpayers to a condition of pauperism, and at the same time impose upon them terms so humiliating that no proud people in any State in this Union would have borne them. I happened to be one of the few Democrats in that legislature of 1874–75 and I know whereof I speak.

We not only knew that we were being systematically and persistently robbed, but we were compelled to look on, powerless and helpless, while it was being done, and to see the house our fathers built desecrated and befouled by as filthy a flock of vultures as ever gathered around a carcass. It is a significant fact, so far as my information extends, that not one of those carpetbaggers who returned home after 1875, or any of their kith or kin, or even any bearing the same name, have ever, by the choice of the people of any Northern State or community, been clothed with any office of honor, or trust, or emolument. This must be due to the fact that where they were best known they were regarded as unworthy.

Now, if you, my Republican friends, could bring yourselves to a realization of what we of the South had to endure in those times, you could understand why we were driven to desperation and in defense of our little property, our homes, our lives, and our honor were compelled to resort to methods in elections the necessity for which we regretted, but which was better than violence and bloodshed. I must not be understood as apologizing for Mississippi. She has nothing to apologize for. She needs no apologist.

In 1875, when "forbearance had ceased to be a virtue," and we realized that a change must be made in the administration of the government or ruin would be the inevitable result, the law-abiding, taxpaying citizens of the State determined that this unholy and degrading state of affairs should end. What I have described as occurring in the State legislature was repeated, only on a smaller scale, in every county in the State having a negro majority.

Gen. J. Z. George, one of the noblest, ablest, and purest men that ever represented Mississippi in the Senate of the United States, as chairman of the Democratic State executive committee led the fight for the election of a Democratic legislature in 1875. His great power of organization and splendid executive ability, reenforced by a corps of able and patriotic assistants, and grim determination on the part of the people won the victory, and in January, 1876, there assembled at the seat of government the most distinguished body of legislators that ever served the State.

Generals, ex-judges, eminent lawyers, wealthy planters, men of all professions and vocations, and all of the highest character, had laid aside more profitable private business and accepted seats in the legislature with one object only in view, and that to "cleanse the Augean stables," drive out the thieves and corruptionists, and restore the government to the people who paid the taxes. With the exception of two, every State officer, from governor down, was either impeached or resigned to avoid impeachment, and left the State followed by a horde of other carpetbaggers from every county, with pockets well filled with ill-gotten gains. It is worthy of remark that one of the two State officers who were found worthy to serve out their terms and to whose door no corruption could be traced, was the secretary of state, a native negro, who had been educated and trained by a former "young mistress."

Since 1875 elections in Mississippi have been as fair as in any State in the Union.

After the removal of Ames in 1876 John M. Stone, the president of the senate, became governor by operation of the constitution, and the administration of this high officer was so pure, able, and patriotic that in 1877 he was elected governor without opposition, receiving nearly 98,000 votes.

In 1881 Gen. Robert Lowry was nominated by the Democrats. He was opposed by a "home" man who claimed to be an "Independent Democrat," and who was supported by a part of the negroes and a large and respectable farmers' organization, which was the forerunner of the Populist movement in Mississippi. Lowry was elected by a majority of about 40,000 in a total vote of 129,511—the largest vote ever polled in the State, either before or since.

In 1885 Lowry was reelected without opposition, receiving a vote of nearly 90,000, which was a loss of nearly 40,000 as compared with that of 1881.

In 1889 Stone was again elected without opposition by a vote of 84,945.

It is proper to state here that the carpetbagger and professed friends of the negroes had industriously instilled into the minds of the too credulous negroes the belief that if the Democratic party ever got into power again they would be returned to slavery, and that, like the man into whom eight devils returned after one had been cast out, their "last state would be worse than the first." But in 1885 a Democrat was inaugurated President of the United States, and we had been blessed with nearly ten years of Democratic State administration, and the negro had learned that his freedom was an accomplished fact, and that he was just as safe under Democratic as under Republican rule, and as a result he commenced to take less interest in politics, especially as he was no longer under the baleful influence of the carpetbagger.

In 1895 the first State election was held under our present constitution, in which there were polled 64,339 votes, a loss of about 20,000, as compared with the election of 1889, the constitution of 1890 having extended the terms of all State officers two years.

In 1873, when the vote was 110,000, the population, as shown by the census of 1870, was about 830,000. Calculating on the basis of one-fifth of this number being males 21 years of age and over, would show a total of more than 165,000, and also that there were 55,000 who did not vote, in the absence of any restriction upon the suffrage.

In 1881, when the unprecedented vote of nearly 130,000 was polled, the population, as shown by the census of 1880, had increased to 1,131,597 which, on a basis of 1 in 5, would have given as the number of males 21 years old, 226,319, showing that nearly 100,000 did not vote.

The registered vote in the State is now about 130,000, and I have shown that not more than half, and frequently less than half, of that number avail themselves of their right to vote. So it will be seen that neither the number of males 21 years old, nor the number who are registered, nor the number who vote can be relied on as a test of the extent of disqualification under our constitution.

I will not stop to answer the charges of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] about lynchings in the South. It comes with poor grace from him in view of the fact that less than a month ago, in his own State, three negroes were run down with bloodhounds and lynched for killing a white barber; and it is said by newspapers that the mob consisted of the best citizens of a town of 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants. Most of the lynchings in the South are for rape and attempts to commit rape. While I do not want to be understood as advocating mob law, I will say that just as long as negroes, or white men either, commit rape upon white women, just so long will lynchings continue. The honor of our women is dearer to us than everything else in this life, and dearer than life itself, and when one of these brutes lays his hand upon one of them swift and certain death will follow without waiting for court, judge, or jury.

Now, as to the merits of the bill under consideration, I say that our representation can not be reduced with any degree of intelligence or fairness, because neither the Census Committee of the House nor the Census Bureau has the necessary information upon which to base such action, nor can it be obtained. In the absence of such information a reduction of our representation would be arbitrary and in violation of the very clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution which gentlemen profess to be so anxious to obey.

The Director of the Census was not required, nor has he undertaken, to furnish the number of voting or nonvoting citizens; the number of disqualified citizens; the number in each disqualified class; the number who voluntarily refused or neglected to vote; the number who, through absence from home or from sickness, failed to register or vote; the number who are disqualified for being unable to read or understand any section of the Constitution when read to them; the number who are disqualified on account of crime, etc. These are facts which must be presented to the House before any intelligent action can be had, and there is no way under the Heavens by which this necessary information can now be obtained.

I say, therefore, that Congress can not, without injustice and disregard of the spirit of the Federal Constitution, enact any law along the lines proposed by the Crumpacker bill or any similar measure. If it should become the fixed purpose of Congress to reduce our representation, it must, when providing for the taking of the next census, require the Director to obtain the information which would enable Congress to act intelligently. In no other way can it be done. It would not do to undertake that now as a supplemental work to the Twelfth Census, because the Constitution provides only for one census every ten years, and that has been taken. Even if this were permissible, just think what a herculean and costly job it would be! There are about 50,000 election precincts in the United States, and an army of 50,000 expert agents would be required for this work, at an enormous cost to the Government.

The Mississippi constitution, largely the product of the masterful intellect of United States Senator J. Z. George, who was a member of the convention, and one of the ablest, noblest, and purest men, as well as one of the most profound constitutional lawyers of his generation, has stood the test of all the courts, State and Federal, and it is now universally conceded that it is in no sense an infraction of the Constitution of the United States.

In addition to the educational tests and the payment of all taxes the franchise clause of our constitution specifies the following crimes, conviction of any one of which disqualifies from registration and voting, viz: "Bribery, burglary, theft, arson, obtaining money or goods under false pretenses, perjury, forgery, embezzlement, and bigamy." This feature is fully authorized by the fourteenth amendment, which declares, in effect, that any State may disfranchise such as have been convicted of any crime without suffering the penalty of having representation reduced on account of such disfranchisement. This will not be denied by anyone.

Now, there are several crimes in this list to which the negro is peculiarly addicted. There are many honest, worthy, law-abiding negroes, and what I may say in this connection is in no sense a reflection upon them; and all such have the respect and confidence of the white people and receive from them the fullest encouragement, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to the contrary notwithstanding.

Every man who is at all familiar with the character of the negro knows how prone he is to steal anything from a watermelon or a chicken to a bale of cotton or a horse. It will be observed that the Constitution does not limit the disqualification to grand larceny, but applies to the stealing of anything of any value, whether great or small, and thousands of negroes and some white men are disfranchised for this crime alone. Perjury is another crime of most frequent occurrence, as it is well known that most negroes who come into the courts as witnesses, and some white men, have no conception of the sanctity of an oath. Everyone who knows anything of negro habits and characteristics knows also that, as a rule, they have but little regard for the sacredness of their marital vows, and do not wait until they are "off with the old before they are on with the new."

The other crimes which disfranchise are also of frequent occurrence. Now, I ask, how can any member of this House say how many males 21 years of age and over are disfranchised because of crime? There are a thousand in our State penitentiary and other thousands who have paid the penalty of the law and are at liberty, but with the disqualification clinging to them. Every year hundreds are being added to this list from the courts all over the State.

I lay down this incontrovertible proposition, that education, frugality, and honesty are the remedies for the negro as well as for the white man, and they furnish the key which unlocks the door to the elective franchise.

It has been intimated by gentlemen in the course of this discussion that Mississippi is not doing her duty in the way of common-school education. I deny it most emphatically. It is true that we do not appropriate as much for this purpose as is available in States whose people have had none of our bitter experiences. The great destruction of our property—not counting the emancipation of our slaves—during the civil war left us poor indeed, and the unblushing robbery of our people under carpetbag government well-nigh completed our impoverishment. But, according to financial ability, we are doing as much for the cause of education as our more highly favored sister States of the Union.

The last report of the State superintendent of education shows that about the sum of $1,500,000 is annually appropriated for common schools, and in addition to this, large appropriations for colleges and other institutions of learning, some of which are for the exclusive education of negro boys and girls in the higher branches. In addition to all this, the State law authorizes the counties and separate school districts to levy and collect taxes for an additional school fund, and many of them avail themselves of this power.

In every neighborhood in the State there are open free public schools from four to eight months in the year for children, white and colored, between the ages of 5 and 21 years; and the money that pays the expenses of these schools is furnished almost entirely by the white taxpayers of the State; and, although the number of negro children in these schools largely exceeds the number of white children, the negro pays less than one-tenth of the taxes. During the scholastic year of 1898–99, as shown by the last report of the State superintendent of education, the enrollment of white children in the free schools was 167,178 and the colored enrollment was 192,368.

The increase of interest in education amongst whites and blacks is very marked. You can scarcely find a young white man now in Mississippi who has not sufficient education to enable him to read and write, and very many of them are not content with this, but reach out for higher education. This is measurably true of the young negroes, and they are taking more interest by far than their race has ever before manifested.

There are thousands of negroes in Mississippi who could qualify as voters, but fail to do so because of want of interest, and prefer to devote themselves to the improvement of their condition along more profitable lines rather than dabble in politics; and I venture the assertion that when the report of the Twelfth Census is made public it will be found that the percentage of illiteracy in Mississippi has been largely decreased as compared with the census of 1890; and under present conditions this percentage of illiteracy will continue to rapidly decrease. If you undertake this business of reducing Southern representation on account of the educational test you will have to practice on a sliding scale and that an ascending one.

As to the condition of the negro in Mississippi, it is the judgment of every thoughtful, observant man familiar with the situation that, out of politics, the negro is far happier and more prosperous than ever before and fewer loafers are found around the towns.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said before, let us alone, and we will work out our destiny profitably and honorably to the white people and satisfactorily to the negro; but if Congress should, in its mistaken zeal for the advancement of the negro and the humiliation of the white people of the proscribed Southern States, do what I don't believe this House intends to do—impose upon us this punitive legislation—let me sound a note of warning—not a threat—that in doing so you may "kill the goose that lays the golden egg" for the negro.

Beware that when you thus dishonor us you do not drive our people to retaliation and cause them to withdraw the white man's money from the black man's children. If we are to be sorely stricken by you on one cheek over the shoulder of the negro, you need not be surprised if we are lacking in that Christian grace which would prompt us to turn the other. And if, by your misguided policy, you should bring this affliction upon the negro, you may live to hear curses loud and deep from the unfortunate people whom you profess to befriend. Already in some quarters mutterings are heard that the "white man's burden" is too great, and that the negro should educate his own children. Unwise and repressive legislation by the Republican majority in Congress would, beyond doubt, intensify this feeling, and by such course you may let loose a storm that will prove disastrous to the educational interests of the negro.

That we will retain our constitutional restriction upon the right of suffrage you need not entertain a doubt. We are determined never again to allow ignorance and venality to control the administration of our State affairs. You have the political power, by force of numbers, to take from us a part of our representation upon this floor by applying to us a rule different from that applied to other and older States of the North having constitutions which disfranchise a part of their citizenship, but you can not compel us to tear down that which stands and shall ever stand as a breakwater between our property holding, taxpaying classes and the ruin which always attends the domination of vice and ignorance. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote on the committee amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman will not do that at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes a member of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ], in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I believe the question before the House is the adoption of the committee amendment to insert the words "and compact?"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I want to say, sir, that while I signed that report I indicated to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], when I addressed the House on the bill, I then doubted seriously the propriety of the insertion of the words. Further reflection has convinced me of the fact, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER], that it is unconstitutional and beyond the power of Congress to so impinge upon the power of the State.

In the next place, I believe that it is unadvisable to do so, because it would raise unnecessary and troublesome questions hereafter in cases of contest. While I do not believe Congress would have the right to determine whether the districts were or not compact, I believe a partisan majority, whatever party might be in predomination here, would assume that right and deprive the duly elected Representatives of their seats.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. KLUTTZ. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I simply desire to correct a statement. I think it was a misapprehension. The gentleman from North Carolina, in response to the gentleman from Virginia, stated that the Burleigh bill did not contain this provision. The provision is in the Burleigh bill.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I corrected that afterwards.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to recommit the bill with instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I move to recommit the bill H. R. 12740 to the Committee on Census, with instructions to ascertain whether any of the States have denied or abridged the right of male inhabitants 21 years of age, who are citizens of the United States, to vote for electors for President and Vice-President, Representatives in Congress, executive and judicial officers of the State, or members of the legislature thereof, in such a manner and to such an extent that the basis of representation should be reduced under the provisions of section 2 of Article XIV of the Federal Constitution; and if such is found to be the case, said committee be further instructed to report, at as early a date as is practicable, an apportionment bill taking such reductions into account, as provided by said section of the Constitution.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question upon that motion.

The previous question was ordered.

PAYMENT OF MESSENGERS WITH ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to present the following bill and ask for its immediate consideration:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, by authority of the Committee on Appropriations, asks immediate consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13394) providing for the payment of electoral messengers.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the payment of the respective States for conveying to the seat of goverment the votes of the electors of said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, at the rate of 25 cents for every mile of the estimated distance for the most usual road traveled from the place of the meeting of the electors to the seat of government of the United States, computing for one distance only, the sum of $12,700 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want to state to the House that this is in the language and is consistent with all preceding legislation on the subject. It is required by statute, and this bill simply appropriates the amount necessary for the mileage.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Do I understand that this bill provides for 25 cents per mile?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; that is the statute.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I think the statute ought to be amended. Railroad transportation has been so much reduced in late years that it seems ridiculous to vote 25 cents a mile for railroad transportation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is all the pay they get.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be considered.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the Compilation of Reports of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate from 1789 to 1900, prepared under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as authorized by the act approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes," 500 copies, of which number 35 copies shall be for the use of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is to be done with the other number? Ought not the resolution to specify how they are to be divided? There is no law fixing any given distribution. It is a valuable document, and a sufficient number ought to be printed for the use of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that this is a Senate resolution. All the copies will go to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. They will all go to the Senate if it is a Senate resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It is a Senate resolution. They are the reports of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand exactly what they are, and I want to have them printed, but I thought if it was a concurrent resolution there ought to be a division.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is a Senate resolution, and that is the reason why no division is made.

Mr. COCKRELL. The cost will not reach over the prescribed amount. I think it ought to be printed. It is a valuable document.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] if a reference is necessary to the Committee on Contingent Expenses in a case like this?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the law provides that the Committee on Printing shall consider it.

Mr. LODGE. The Committee on Printing has considered it, and considered it favorably. I will state to the Senate that this is an extremely valuable publication, and I trust the resolution will be adopted. I do not think there is any action necessary further than what is proposed to be taken.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGULAR OFFICERS AS OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the names of all officers of the Regular Army who were appointed to be officers of volunteers since May 1, 1898, the rank said officers held in the Regular Army when so appointed, the rank to which appointed in the volunteers, and the rank now held in the volunteers; whether any regular officers so appointed to volunteer regiments have been assigned to duty other than that of duty in the field with their regiments, the names of officers so detailed, with the date of the detail, the special duty to which assigned, and where such special duty has been and is now being performed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. Personally I have no objection to it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana moves the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the Senator from Connecticut rose to speak to the question. I should like to hear what he has to say before the resolution is disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I did not rise to speak to the resolution, which calls for a lot of appointments and details. I was about to say that I have no objection to its being adopted now. I have been looking at it and thinking about it. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I understand that it is necessary, before 1 o'clock, to ask unanimous consent? Is not a motion proper to take up the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion is in order. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs, in line 4, page 43, section 34, before the word "wine," to strike out "beer;" and in line 5, after the words "or any," to strike out "intoxicating liquors" and insert "distilled spirits;" so as to make the section read:

The sale of or dealing in wine or any distilled spirits by any person in any post exchange or canteen or Army transport or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is probably true that long ere this stage of the discussion Senators have individually formed definite opinions, and hence any further argument can have little effect in either fixing or unsettling their respective views.

On a question so important as this it is due not only to the individual, but probably to the body itself, that the reasons for supporting or antagonizing the amendment offered by the committee should be given.

He who, in the face of all the testimony of the officers of the Army favorable to the sale of beer in the post exchanges, can see nothing to support their contention must be either blinded by prejudice or blindly self-opinionated. There is no evil that does not produce some good results, and no good that does not bring forth some evil effects. The only proper course, therefore, is to adopt that which will give the greatest benefits with the least injuries.

It has been assumed that because the Army officers are almost a unit in favor of the committee's amendment their conclusions should have governing force with us who have but slight personal acquaintance with the subject.

But, Mr. President, I look to the expert not so much for his conclusions as for the facts, and when he has put me in possession of the facts upon which he bases his opinions he has placed me upon an equal footing, and I may draw my own conclusions, which must be paramount with me.

Now, I do not presume there is a single Senator or an Army officer but will admit not only that the use of beer is detrimental, even to the extent consumed in the post exchange, but that total abstinence would be a godsend to the Army. But their contention, in a nutshell, is this, and we will see whether it will bear close analysis: They say, and everyone knows it to be a fact, that in the cities and surrounding the Army posts are saloons, or dives, more properly called, where the vilest of all liquors are sold, and where every alluring vice, from the gambling room to the thrice-dangerous brothel, abounds; that the unvarying monotony of the life of a private soldier, without some attraction in the post, impels him first to the saloon, where in almost reckless abandonment he imbibes not a glass of beer, but the worst drug concoction imaginable, which at once unchecks the rein of judgment and lets loose his unbridled passions, carrying moral and physical wreck in their train.

And I might add, what is an equally known fact, that a large percentage, if not a large majority, of the privates in the Regular Army have strong convictions that there is no moral wrong in taking a glass of liquor, but that in depriving them of that right you are depriving them of their just liberty—the right as intelligent beings to determine for themselves their drink as their diet; and, so feeling, they are restive under this restraint, and that spirit intensifies their desire to assert what they consider their personal privilege, and excess in drink when outside is the result.

And they tell us that the post exchange, with its beer and light wines, its luxuries in food, its gymnasium, its games, and reading matter—in fact, the private soldiers' club—creates a counter attraction which keeps the soldier away from these surrounding physical and moral death traps.

It is probably equally true that if the young men of the country understand that a soldier's life is equivalent to a term in the penitentiary—is a reform school, where he surrenders both liberty and individuality—you would find it extremely difficult to recruit a standing army of intelligent, patriotic privates. And when I have said this I have placed their contention in its strongest bearing. Now, I believe, and I think the record will bear out the assertions of the officers of the Army and the supporters of the amendment, that since we have inaugurated the post exchange as it now exists crime, desertions, and the thousand evils that flow from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors have vastly decreased.

But here comes the question, What feature of the post exchange should be credited with all these good results? What is it that contributes to these great benefits?

Is it the beer and light wines, or is it the club, the reading, the gymnasium, the games, the social opportunities? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] says he will vote for the committee's amendment because it promotes sobriety. What is it that promotes the sobriety? Is it the drinking of an intoxicant that promotes sobriety, or is it the other pleasures and diversions that satisfies and prevents the desire for an unnatural and artificial stimulant?

Suppose you retain all the good features of the post exchange—that you sell everything you sell now except two articles, beer and light wine—would that destroy its utility and beneficial effects?

If a soldier wishes a glass of beer, he desires it for its effect, and that effect is its intoxication. To what extent does beer add to the enjoyment? Just to the extent that it intoxicates, and no more.

If it is taken simply for its refreshment, then there are hundreds of soft drinks equally refreshing, equally inviting to the taste, and without deleterious effect.

Your position is that in allowing a half drunk you satisfy the individual desire and at the same time prevent a full drunk. I do not believe that is good logic. On the contrary, it is a physiological as well as a psychological fact that the partially satisfied desire for intoxicating stimulus only intensifies the desire for greater intoxication. Shut off from all the diverting and self-satisfying social and business relations of civil life, this insidious tantalizer, slight intoxication, necessarily brings most disastrous results. It creates a desire for greater intoxication. It creates it under circumstances that would not surround the individual except in Army life.

Mr. President, it was suggested here yesterday that only about 450 soldiers and sailors were lost by wounds or by being killed directly in battle during the war with Spain. During that time about 5,000 died of disease. It is safe to say that, in any ordinary war, while one individual is killed by the bullet of the enemy at least ten times that number die of some disease.

It is equally well established, at least to my satisfaction, that the great majority of the deaths in the Army, if not directly due to the use of intoxicating liquors, are certainly indirectly due to that habit, and that by their use they so debilitate the individual that he is unable to withstand the changes of climate and the conditions unnatural to him into which he has been forced by the Army discipline.

While we are expending millions upon millions of dollars for the protection of the individual against any character of injury from the enemy, while all of our tactics are directed toward the preservation of human life in open engagement while at the same time it may inflict the greatest injury to the opponent, but comparatively little attention is given to the protection of the life of the individual while in the post.

Mr. President, considering the great comparisons in the matter of the death rate in actual engagement and out of engagement, remembering also that whilst we have one year of actual warfare we have from twenty-five to thirty years of peace, in which there is no stimulus to the soldier to take any part in active exercises at the post, the natural tendency of our young men is to become dissatisfied. That tendency leads them to the use of drink, and that produces the most extraordinary and deleterious effects upon the Army.

If we give one-half of our attention to the protection of the individual against this one article, which produces more deaths, directly or indirectly, than any other one thing, it seems to me that we shall have done our duty, and when we have done less than that we have failed to fulfill our requirements as persons having in charge the real welfare of the Army.

Mr. President, it has been suggested all along here that the real benefits were due entirely to the use of light wines and beers in the exchange. Very little has been said about the other things—the games and the many things that are in the post that tend to make the life of the private soldier more agreeable, which, I believe, have had ten times the effect in lessening the death rate and in lessening the number of desertions by making life more agreeable. Everyone, it seems to me, knows and fully comprehends that the life of a private in the Army, in time of peace—at least until within the last twenty years—has not been a life that would be desired by many of your young men. It seems to me that our duty is to guard them in time of peace, and that duty means that we should give attention to everything that will make life agreeable and pleasant to the privates. When we have done that, we have taken away the great temptation for strong drink.

I can not agree with that philosophy which says that the soldier who from an inherent taste desires strong liquors will be willing to stop with a glass of beer at the exchange. If his desire is so strong that it becomes a necessity, overruling his better judgment, notwithstanding the exchange, notwithstanding the light liquors sold at the exchange, he will find his way to the city, and he will find his way to those vile resorts surrounding every Army post, and will suffer the same results as though no intoxicating or but slightly intoxicating liquors were allowed to be sold to the soldiers in the post itself.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that we gain but very little in allowing light drinks to be used there, while nothing more heavy is sold. At least, whatever may be the opinion of Senators, I believe that we are entitled to have a fair, honest trial of the canteen or the post exchange without the sale of intoxicating liquors. I do not know how this would affect, or is expected to affect the sale of intoxicating liquors in prohibition States, but I believe you will find that if you will place an army in the State of North Dakota, or any other prohibition State, that there will be just as few desertions from the Army at that place as there will be in places where soldiers can receive their beer at the post or elsewhere.

So, for my own part, I believe that nothing short of justice would require that I cast my vote in favor of a fair trial of the canteen without the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the canteen ought to be distinguished from the post exchange. It is not necessary in order to have the post exchange that we shall have the canteen system. So far as I am aware and know, nobody proposes to make any attack upon the post exchange. I have no doubt that the Army has derived benefit from that system. What is objected to is the sale of intoxicating drinks inside of the posts. In 1899 Congress passed the following act on the 2d of March:

SEC. 17. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

Mr. President, the canteen system was not established by law. It was established by a military order. This provision of the law, which was intended to compel the abandonment of the canteen system, was a direction to the military department of the Government. If it had not been passed, the power existed to destroy the canteen at any time the Commander in Chief of the Army—that is, the President of the United States—or the Secretary of War desired.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate, and, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the country as well, to the fact that it was not necessary for the purpose of destroying the canteen that Congress should act or pass any law, unless the executive department of the Government declined to act. The executive department of the Government having put this canteen system in force, there was objection to it made throughout the country, and an appeal was made to Congress to destroy it.

We passed what, I think, is a clear, well-defined prohibition. As a lawyer, I have no hesitation in saying that it is clear and unequivocal, but in order to destroy its effect the Department of Justice, in construing the law, changed the character of the law. It is well understood that the punctuation of a bill is as much a part of the bill as the wording of it. The Department of Justice changed the punctuation of the law; it put into two paragraphs what is practically in one; and then, arguing upon the second branch of the paragraph, which is part of the first, declared that we could not have intended to destroy the canteen system, and the system thus survived.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into a discussion of the merits of the Attorney-General's decision. I simply say that, submitted to me, I could not have construed it in that way. He could not have construed it that way if he had not put a semicolon where there was a comma. I do not mean to say that he changed the text of the law, because he did not, but when he wrote his opinion, where there was a comma, he put a semicolon, and then proceeded to argue upon false premises, and so came to a false conclusion.

It is proposed by the House of Representatives, in the provision which they insert in the bill, that we shall get rid of the canteen. For myself I have listened with a great deal of interest and a great deal of attention to the statements made here by Army officers, and especially by those who were formerly against the canteen and are now for it, who say that their experience has changed their views. Yet I am not convinced that the canteen system is a wise and a proper one. On the contrary, I believe that it is vicious; and so, I think, believe the great body of the American people who are concerned in promoting temperance, morality, and virtue. I think it is a sort of shock to the moral sentiment of this country that the Government of the United States shall put back of liquor selling its great force and character.

Mr. President, the Senator who sits next to me [Mr. HAWLEY] says "not liquor." It has been attempted here, and attempted by some of these Army officers, to make it appear that wine is not an intoxicating drink.

Mr. HAWLEY. We exclude wine.

Mr. TELLER. I meant beer. In my judgment, if you have to take either wine or beer, you had better take light wine, for it is not, as has been repeatedly demonstrated, as deleterious as beer. No man need stand here and say to us that beer is not an intoxicating drink. We have seen hundreds of men go down to drunkards' graves as beer drinkers in the section of country in which I live, and no doubt the same is the case in other sections. There is not any worse form of drunkenness in the United States than that occasioned by beer drinking. It is not only detrimental to morals, but it is detrimental to health. It may be that drinking beer in moderate quantities probably does not hurt; and a moderate drink of whisky may not hurt a good healthy man. I have never tried it. I do not use either whisky or beer, and never have done so; but I know from observation that men can get as stupidly and as blindly drunk on beer as on anything else, and every other Senator in this body knows that to be a fact. So you are selling intoxicating drinks in the canteen if you permit the selling of beer.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into any discussion as to the evil influences of the use of beer or wine or of strong drinks generally. The public understand that matter; but the best element of American society all over the country have come here ever since the canteen was opened and entered loud and strong protests against it. The attempt which has been made of late to make it appear that the saloon interests of the country were back of this movement is simply so absurd that it is not worth while to talk about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. But it is true nevertheless.

Mr. TELLER. It is not true, even if the chairman of the committee does say so. I challenge him to say that it is true. The saloon interest is not back of this movement, and the Senator can not prove that it is. The saloon interests at the posts may be for it; but the great fight which has been made against the canteen, the Senator from Connecticut knows, is not made by the saloon interests; and it is unfair for him to say in this body that it is. He knows that the fight is made by the church people, the temperance people, the moral people, and the decent people of the United States; and it is made against the rum-drinking and the rum-selling elements in this country. The great brewery combinations are on his side; all the great, wicked elements interested in the sale of intoxicating drinks in the country are on his side; and he need not say to us that we represent the saloon element, for it is not true.

Mr. President, we have the right to exclude intoxicating liquor from our soldiers, and it is our duty to exclude it. I say that you have no right to put such a temptation in a place or in juxtaposition to it, where a soldier has a right to go, where he might find it his pleasure to go, and where he ought to find it his pleasure to go, because there he ought to find newspapers and magazines and social relations which he ought to have—you have no right to put by the side of it or in it, as in many places you have done, the temptation to an American boy, who goes from an honest American home where liquor, whether beer or wine, is not used, to drink it at his own impulse or at the request of somebody else. Every American father and every American mother who send out their boy into the Army, or allow him to go, has the right to insist that the Government of the United States shall not put such temptation in front of him.

Mr. President, no executive officer can escape the duty he owes to the country to take hold of this question. If he believes, of course, that the canteen is a blessing, a good thing, and that the soldier has a right to it, then it becomes probably his duty to sustain it; but he should not do that under the pretense that we did not provide a law which compelled him to do it when he had the power all the time—as the canteen existed by virtue of an Executive order—by a stroke of the pen to have destroyed it.

We have now in another part of the world ten or twelve million people not addicted to the use of strong drink. The President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army, now represented by a commission of five men, has absolute authority to deal with this question, and if we are to believe the testimony of the best men who have been to Manila—representatives of this Government, not only in the civil service, so far as there is any civil representation there, but military officers—if we may believe the representations of the church people who have gone there, of the missionary bishops of one of the greatest churches in this land, of a number of other missionaries, we are cursing that people with such a curse as they were never cursed with under Spanish domination—a curse that will in the end be as vicious and as vile and as dangerous to those people as all the oppressions of Spain and Spanish greed and avarice have ever been. It is within the power of the Executive, or within the power of this body acting with the other, to shut out from those people the temptation we are allowing to be put in front of them simply that we may make commerce with those islands.

I have seen recently a statement of the vast increase of our commerce; but if you will examine as to what it consists of, you will find the increase of commerce is very largely in the increase of the sale of intoxicating drinks.

Mr. President, I promised yesterday the Senator who seems to be concerned as to this matter that I would not delay this bill by any lengthy discussion of the canteen question. I regard the question of infinite importance to the American people; I regard it as of infinite importance to the morale of the Army of the United States; but I do not believe it is as great a question as some other questions which are before us for consideration. I think I shall discharge my duty when I enter my protest—a decided protest—against the Government of the United States making beer selling and beer drinking respectable. I do not set myself up to say that a man may or may not drink if he chooses, but I do say that the Government of the United States has no right to put this temptation in front of the American soldier. If he will, as it is said he will, go out and hunt liquor somewhere else, that is his business and not ours. We should restrain him as far as possible in that respect, so far as is consistent with liberty.

I wish to call attention to and to put in the RECORD a few statements to which my attention has been called as to the condition in the Philippine Islands. It is said that when we went there there were 4,000 saloons; that we have destroyed them, and that they have been decreased now to 700. I have heard that repeatedly stated in order to justify our conduct over there. Now, I want to read a statement from Mr. Edwards, who was our consul there for many years and for many years a resident of the islands. I shall not read it all. He says:

During my long residence in the Philippines I rarely saw a drunken native or Spaniard. Certainly not more than two or three in a year. In crowds of 10,000 people not one would be seen or heard. To call a Spaniard a drunkard was a much greater insult than to call him a liar. The natives drank "tuba," the juice extracted from the cocoa palm, which Mr. Dean C. Worcester, of the two Philippine commissions, thus described: "The unfermented 'tuba dulce' is a pleasant and nourishing drink, often recommended for those who are recovering from severe illness, on account of its flesh-producing properties. The fermented product is a mild intoxicant."

The principal drink was "tuba," and the "gin shaks"—

This is a quotation and this is what we have been calling them—

mentioned by Chaplain Pierce (up to 1888, when I last saw Manila) sold little else than this harmless beverage. The great point is that from 1852 to 1888, the range of my personal knowledge of the islands, drunkenness was practically unknown among the natives or Spaniards.

The Spanish cafés sold mostly Spanish wines, and men would sit an hour chatting over a glass or two of wine, and smoking in front or in them, with never a sign of intoxication. Nothing like the American saloon was ever known in Manila while I lived there; and I heartily indorse the remark of President Schurman, the chairman of the Philippine Commission, as quoted by you from the Independent, and in his address to the Liberal Club of Buffalo.

This is what Mr. Schurman said:

I regret that the Americans allowed the saloon to get a foothold on the islands. That has hurt the Americans more than anything else, and the spectacle of Americans drunk awakens disgust in the Filipinos. We suppressed the cock fights there and permitted the taverns to flourish.

No one in this country believes that cock fighting is as degrading and as demoralizing as the free use of intoxicants in a tropical climate. Cock fighting may not be the most elevating thing, but yet, beyond the mischief which is inflicted on two cocks, it would not hurt anybody very much.

One emphasized the Filipino frailty and the other the American vice.

That is well stated, too.

I have never seen a Filipino drunkard. The Filipinos have some excellent virtues. They are exceedingly cleanly and also exceedingly temperate. Even the members of this Liberal Club would shock them by the amount of wine most of you have consumed this evening.

Mr. President, there is an article in Leslie's Weekly, by Mr. H. Irving Hancock, their Manila correspondent, which I call to the attention of the Senate, so that it may go into the RECORD. I want to do it for two reasons. I want to do it because the people of the United States do not understand generally, I think, the character of the Filipino. I want also to show what a demoralizing influence in this beginning of the twentieth century, nineteen hundred years after the birth of Christ, this great Christian nation is exhibiting there.

The Filipinos of Manila are rather slow to take to drink. They have always heretofore been an abstemious people. Yet slowly but surely the natives are veering around to the temptation to be found in the saloon. Five years more of the present saloon reign in Manila will see a sad demoralization of the natives.

At present the nondrinking majority of the Filipinos feel only contempt for the American whom they see lurchingly walking the streets or crouching in silly semistupor in the cabs on their way to office, home, or barracks.

There is nowhere in the world such an excessive amount of drinking per capita as among the few thousand Americans at present living in Manila. Nor does this mean that we have sent the worst dregs of Americans there. Far from it; some of the best American blood is represented in Manila, men of brains and attainments, who would nobly hold up our name were not the saloon at every step. Gamblers and depraved women—in both classes the very dregs of this and other countries—have followed and work hand in hand with their natural ally. These people are fast teaching the natives the depths of Caucasian wickedness, and the natives imagine this is Americanism.

We tried to civilize the Indian and incidentally wiped whole tribes off the earth by permitting disreputable white traders to supply him with ardent liquors. Are we to repeat this disgrace, tenfold, as we at present seem fair to do in the Philippines?

The following testimony is from Capt. Everard E. Hatch, Eighteenth United States Infantry:

The great source of evil has come from the liquor interests. The first followers of an army are the saloons, with disreputable women a close second. To repress their pernicious influence taxes the efforts of those in authority. One shipload of liquor was in Manila Harbor before the city was taken by the Americans. The agent of the company was with the Army, wearing a military uniform, under the guise of a "volunteer aid." The city taken, the "volunteer aid" cast aside his uniform, located a depot, and proceeded to establish saloons. In a few weeks the principal streets were transformed. The one brand of whisky and beer handled by the firm received a great boom, and in a way got a great start of competitors. It was not for long. In a few weeks every brand of beer and whisky in America was represented, and the different agents vied for business and supremacy.

I call the attention of the Senate to his conclusion. He says:

The saloons were directly responsible for more of the friction, disturbances, and estrangements with the natives than all other causes combined.

Now, Mr. President, here is the testimony of an American Methodist bishop, a man whose province it is to take charge of the Christianizing of these and other races. Nobody will doubt his word; nobody will say that he talks for political effect. This was written in April, 1899:

Every alternate place of business seems to be a liquor shop of some kind—

This is in Manila—

and the soldier has temptation before his eyes whichever way he may turn. * * * Drunken soldiers meet me everywhere, and it is painful in the extreme to remember that many of them have come from Christian homes and that they have been thrust into the very jaws of temptation from which only a strong man can be expected to escape.

This is by Bishop Thoburn, who is known at least by a good many members of this Senate.

Here is a quotation from an address delivered at the Young Men's Christian Association rooms in the city of Manila by Chaplain Cephas C. Bateman, of the United States Army. He said:

The degradation of Manila means the degradation of Luzon, and the degradation of Luzon would result in the degradation of the whole archipelago, and the city of Manila would be a reproach and disgrace to the whole American nation. Every man should have pride that he is a representative of occidental thought and progress, and he ought to be ashamed to give himself over to sin.

A mestizo of repute said the common people of the islands never saw a drunken man until the Americans came. That may not be so, but I never saw a drunken Filipino or Chinaman. The people have reason to believe that the United States is a nation of drunkards. All the men should take this to heart. What have we come to these islands for? To establish a peace-loving people. Shall we leave them worse than we found them?

Mr. LODGE. If it would not interrupt the Senator from Colorado, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. He is reading what I have read, the gravity of which I appreciate, relative to the saloons that have been established by Americans in Manila.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. It does not touch the canteen question, except indirectly.

Mr. TELLER. It does not touch the canteen question.

Mr. LODGE. No; and the stoppage of the sale of beer at the canteen would not affect it.

Mr. TELLER. Not in the slightest.

Mr. LODGE. I want to say, and I am glad the Senator has brought it out, that there is an evil of the worst kind—the establishment of American barrooms in Manila in the wake of our army; and if there is any way to have them closed, I should be glad to see it done.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator was not here when I commenced?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TELLER. It is in the power of the President to close every one of them as quick as a telegram can reach Manila. If the President declines to do it, it is within the power of this body and the House to compel it to be done. Will anybody say, in view of what I have read and mean to read, that it is not our duty to act promptly?

Mr. GALLINGER. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that this morning an officer, whose name I will not give, but who stands in the forefront of American generals, deplored this condition, in conversation with me, saying he had knowledge of the existence of four or five hundred American saloons, and that they were licensed by an officer who some time ago was in charge of military affairs in the archipelago. He said they of course could be very readily abolished if a military order to that effect should be issued.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It is whether he knows of any statement that has been made in regard to that, as to why this condition exists?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether there has or not. I talked with an American officer, a regular officer, whom I have known for thirty-odd years, who emphasized to me this condition there, and I felt humiliated to have him say that it existed only where we had power and were exerting it, and that in that section of the country where our power had not been felt the old condition existed.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator excuse me for trespassing on his time?

Mr. TELLER. I do not mind it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know the reason for this condition of things in Manila, but I do know that under American orders and under the command of General Ludlow that thing was absolutely stopped in the city of Habana. I refer to the opening of barrooms and saloons by Americans following in the wake of the Army. I know that was done. I had a long talk last spring with General Ludlow about it. It was entirely abolished.

Mr. TELLER. When in Cuba last spring I never heard of any complaint of anything of that kind in Cuba, but I do know from the public press, I know it from conversations with men who have returned from there, both civilians and officers, that this condition of affairs existed. I want to read what an officer of the United States, Sergeant Wherry, says:

> The soldier's greatest enemy here—
>
> Manila—
> is strong drink. When we took possession of the city there was scarcely an open saloon to be seen, but in a few days they marred every prominent place in the city. Beer by shiploads began to arrive. When the first pay was given, the soldiers in the town almost went wild. The saloon keepers, human vultures who had followed the Army in most cases, began to rake in the soldiers' money, and have kept it up ever since. When the Army entered the city there was hardly a case of sickness in any of the companies, but in a short time the sick list began to lengthen, and the cause in fully half the cases was drink. At the present time the saloons are doing a rushing business, and will probably continue to do so. A full page of the newspapers is taken up each day by an advertisement for a certain brand of American beer. Almost every case of disturbance is the direct result of drinking. The inmates of the guardhouse in nearly every case found their way there through the neck of the bottle. A few months spent here should make an uncompromising temperence advocate of any American who desires to see his country's greatness advanced and her moral and religious standard upheld. We boast of our civilization, but it is a poor example that the American has set to the new ward of the United States—the Filipino. There is something radically wrong somewhere.

Mr. President, a great deal more of this character might be read. I wish to read, in answer to the statement so often made that there are less saloons now in Manila than when we took the city, what Mr. Harold Martin, Associated Press representative in Manila, said June 28 in the Independent:

> Before the arrival of the American soldier in Manila there was very little heavy drinking here, and this because both Spaniards and Filipinos are temperate people; they do not drink to excess. Anyone who has been in Spain, or who has seen the Spanish soldiers in Cuba, in Porto Rico, and the Philippines, will admit they are not addicted to heavy drinking, and I do not think this point needs any further support. And the Filipino is as temperate as the Spaniard. I have been in these islands for one year, and I have yet to see an intoxicated native. * * *
> Hence, given the incontrovertible facts that both Spaniards and Filipinos are not addicted to drink, we can understand how Manila got on before we came here with three saloons licensed for the sale of liquors, such as brandy, whisky, and other strong drink, while to-day, May 10, there are 170 licensed saloons in the city and 53 licenses for the wholesale distribution of liquor.
> Before we came here there were in and about Manila some 4,000 native wine rooms licensed for the sale of Spanish wines and the native bino. Bino is a fiery drink distilled from grain, generally rice, and flavored with anise seed. It is very strong, and when taken in excess by our men renders them temporarily crazy and utterly irresponsible. * * * When we first came to Manila the American soldiers very quickly discovered where bino could be had, and owing to their excessive use thereof the authorities were forced to close many of these wine rooms. Formerly those places were frequented by the natives, by the Spanish soldiers, and by the Chinamen of the city. Since the Spaniards have gone the demand for Spanish wines has dropped, and to-day about 700 of these native wine rooms are doing business. * * * Their licenses are much more costly now than formerly, and this fact and the departure of the Spanish troops accounts for the very considerable decrease in their numbers. These 4,000 wine rooms can not be considered saloons. They were, with very few exceptions, quiet and orderly places where Spaniards and natives went for their wine. Such wine rooms are distinctly a product of wine-drinking countries, such as France, Italy, and Spain, and I believe that one well-patronized saloon, here or at home, is accountable for as much drunkenness and disorder as were 1,000 of these wine rooms in Manila. * * *

I want to read that again to those people who are saying that the American domination over there has reduced the number of saloons:

> I believe that one well-patronized saloon here or at home is accountable for as much drunkenness and disorder as were 1,000 of these wine rooms in Manila.

Mr. President, that is not all of it, but I will not weary the Senate by reading more. However, I will read an extract from the report of the general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association:

> The Filipinos, while pagan and semicivilized, are moral and sober. They first learn of Christianity from the profane sailor, and when they see immense numbers of drunken, profane, and immoral soldiers representing this country they have little respect for the religion they profess. "If that is your religion," they say, "we prefer our own."

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry? Is not the Senator describing a situation in existence prior to the order of the Taft Commission abolishing the saloons on the Escholta and plazas in Manila and prohibiting the sale of vino and other native spirituous drinks in the saloons and anywhere to a soldier?

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator say the saloons have been abolished?

Mr. McCOMAS. I asked him if he is not aware of the fact that the sale has been abolished in those places in Manila and very much restricted otherwise by the Taft Commission?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not mean to say they do not sell liquor in Manila?

Mr. McCOMAS. I mean to ask the Senator if he has not been made aware, as is stated on page 35——

Mr. TELLER. I have been describing a condition which existed in Manila two months ago.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am asking the Senator whether or not that condition has not been very much abated by the action of the Taft Commission?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will produce any evidence on that point, I will be delighted.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will read, if the Senator will permit me, what I find on page 35 of this document.

Mr. TELLER. In a moment. The last statement made from there was that the Taft Commission was controlling it, and, I believe, had increased the amount of license; and that was within the last ten days.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will read it.

Mr. TELLER. I will let the Senator read it.

Mr. McCOMAS. I read from page 35. Chaplain Miller says:

> Under the recent order of Judge Taft, president of the commission in the Philippines, all the saloons are banished from the Escholta and plazas in Manila, a much higher license imposed on those that remain, and the sale of vino and other native spirituous drinks prohibited in the saloons and anywhere to a soldier. This puts Manila, in temperance and morals, ahead of most of the cities of our home land, and I do not believe I was ever in a city where law and order are so well established or where punishment so quickly follows crime.

If the Senator will allow me, I should be very glad if out of his experience and with his skill he would draft an amendment to this bill—I should like to vote for it—still further enforcing the suppression of American saloons and the sale of poisonous native distillations.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I think there is no doubt that the Taft Commission has improved the situation in Manila, but I do believe that something could be done by legislation to improve it still further; and I think there is nothing we could do that would be more beneficial than to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of the evils about which the Senator has been reading and of which I read with a great deal of pain.

Mr. TELLER. The other day in executive session the Senator, I believe, procured the passage of a treaty intended to secure the protection of the dark races in Africa and other places from the use of intoxicating drinks, and I think there is nobody better qualified to prepare such an amendment to this bill than the Senator from Massachusetts, and I wish he would do it. I should be delighted to vote for it.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty the Senator refers to was made public, and it was passed as the Senator states.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. And the Senate also agreed to a resolution expressing its opinion that it was desirable to prevent the introduction of spirituous liquors into such regions as these for sale to the aboriginal inhabitants. With that I am wholly in sympathy.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Massachusetts introduced it.

Mr. LODGE. I introduced it, and the Senate agreed to it unanimously.

Mr. TELLER. I voted for it, and I should be very much delighted if he would draft an amendment to fit this case. He belongs to the party in power, and I think it would be a little wiser, perhaps, for it to come from him than from me. In answer to the Senator from Maryland, that I may not appear to be reading ancient history, I will call his attention to an article in the London National Review for September. This is from the pen of John Foreman. He is an English engineer who went to that country and spent about eleven years as an engineer and some eight or ten years more living in the country attending to business. He was before our commission. He wrote the most interesting book on the islands that has ever been published, in my opinion. He has a full and thorough acquaintance with those people. I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that I have not brought this up in a way to attack anybody or to gain any political advantage or anything else, but in the interest of what I believe to be justice and right.

> The conduct of the boisterous, undisciplined individuals who formed a large percentage of the first volunteer contingent sent to Manila has had an ineffaceably demoralizing effect on the proletariat and has inspired a feeling of horror and loathful contempt in the affluent and educated classes who guide Philippine public opinion. From the outset it was a mistake to treat the Christian Philippine population like savages ignorant of Western civilization, considering that there are thousands of Filipinos mentally equal to the invading forces, and comparable, in intellectual training, with the average middle-class European. I would point out that the Philippine Christian population includes not only those of pure Malay descent, but a large admixture of sagacious Spanish and Chinese half-castes, educated in the university and colleges of Manila, in Hongkong, Europe, and other places.
> Within a fortnight after the capitulation of Manila the drinking saloons had increased fourfold. According to the latest advices there are at least twenty to one existing in the time of the Spaniards. Drunkenness, with its consequent evils, is rife all over the city among the new white population. The orgies of the newcomers, the incessant street brawls, the insults offered with impunity to natives of both sexes, the entry with violence into private houses by the soldiery, who maltreat the inmates and lay hands on what they choose, were hardly calculated to arouse in the natives admiration for their new masters. Brothels were absolutely prohibited under Spanish rule, but since the evacuation there has been a great influx of women of ill fame.

There is some more than that which might be read. There is a chapter that might be read of the condition in the Sulu Island, which is enough to make any man ashamed who has any idea of decency.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make a statement. On account of another duty I am compelled to be absent from the Chamber during the rest of the day's session. I am sorry for it, because I wanted to be here to vote upon this proposition. Inasmuch as I will perhaps not be here when it is voted on, I simply wish to announce the reason why I am absent, and that if here I should vote to abolish the canteen. I should vote against the Senate amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator will pair with some one.

Mr. FORAKER. I am paired. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to put into the RECORD a statement made by the Rev. F. H. Morgan, a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal board in Singapore. I think I will read it. He is vouched for by the Rev. Dr. Leonard, secretary of the Methodist Episcopal board, as a worthy and reliable man. Some of the Senators know Dr. Leonard.

The colonial expansion which has taken place in our country has brought in its train certain evils which we have never met hitherto. Great Britain and the continental powers have set the pace in many things which are not altogether acceptable to Christian sentiment at home or abroad, and one of the evils which they have fostered, but from which we have hitherto been free, is the pandering to the vice of soldiers. It is a fact that is not probably known at home that the iniquitous "contagious-diseases acts," formerly openly, and at the present time, it is claimed, secretly, enforced in the cantonments of India, are now in effect in our new possessions. The subject was brought to my attention a few weeks ago, but, unwilling to jump at conclusions, I have waited until I could confirm the statements then made that in Sulu, and if there, doubtless in other places, there is a quarter set off by the commanding officer, General Kobbé, as the recognized resort of prostitutes—

That is what I referred to, not intending then to read it—that these women, mostly Japanese, are brought there with the knowledge and consent, if not the approval, of the authorities; that they are segregated and only soldiers allowed to consort with them; that sentries are posted at the entrance to keep peace and order and prevent the entrance of natives or the escape of the women, and that it is a recognized institution of our military occupation. The officers have full knowledge of it, but have yielded to the sophistry so common among military men that you "can't prevent the men doing such things, hence it is better to safeguard them as much as possible."

That is the argument used in reference to the canteen.

Do our Christian people at home realize what this means—that their sons are taken from Christian homes in Christian America and brought to the Tropics, with all the seductive influences prevalent there, and under the sanction of their officers find everything made as easy as possible for them to live lives of impurity and vice; that our Christian Government, through its representatives, provides every facility for such sin, and says, by actions, if not by words, that it is necessary, and that a young man can not be continent and pure away from home and mother? The canteen is evil, but this is infinitely worse. Ought not the matter to be investigated and the seal of disapproval set upon it by the united Christian sentiment of our land? We want pure men to guard these outposts and to set the native races an example. The reports which came to my ears were confirmed by the Sultan of Sulu himself in an interview which I recently had with him.

Mr. President, I will ask permission to put in, without reading, a statement by Miss Alice B. Condict, a doctor and missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Manila:

Several missionaries here have recently received letters from the home land inquiring as to the truth of accounts published in the United States of the licensing of houses of prostitution for the benefit of our United States soldiers. I have accordingly been making inquiries and find to my chagrin that these shocking reports are only too true facts. I am forced to write it. Our United States Government officers have established here regular houses for prostitute women, examining them every week and giving each a certificate, with her own photograph on it, to securely identify the girl who holds it. The reports are that after election is over in the United States the military authorities think of having this system of prevention of disease more systematically carried out here.

This, of course, is simply the iniquitous plan of men who regard the Army simply as so much fighting material. The idea of right or wrong has not been considered at all; therefore the dark deeds have become the military law. It therefore behooves Christian America to rise and assert herself. Especially is it the province of Christian women to come to the front, and I fully expect and believe they will be found fully equal (with God as their leader) to rise and put an end to this horrible evil.

I have gone a little beyond the canteen, because I wanted to attract the attention of the Senate to the fact that these questions are under the control of the Government of the United States without any legislation. The President of the United States can close every grog shop in Manila in an hour. He is responsible to nobody. A power that can sit there and collect taxes and can appropriate the taxes when collected as it sees fit, can not be restrained from enacting rules to close up these dens of vice, whether they be in Manila or whether they be in Sulu. We will not escape the responsibility that falls upon us, if the President fails to do this, if we do not compel, by words which can not be frittered away by an ingenious Attorney-General, to close them up and to maintain temperance and decency wherever the American flag floats over land where, whatever may be said of our relations to those people, we are now the dominant power and are denying every other power on earth the right to be heard. We have taken away from the people of Manila the right to legislate for themselves, and if they desire to close up these shops they are impotent to do it. Therefore we ought to do it, and if we do not do it, we ought to receive the condign contempt of the American people.

Mr. President, I do not belong to the party that is in power in the Senate, and I know very well, and I have seen it demonstrated here again and again, it has been the experience that if you desire to seek legislation of this character you must call upon the friends who have the majority in the Chamber to initiate it and support it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. I am perfectly willing to wait.

Mr. TELLER. I will be through in a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would offer it. I should like to hear it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not believe the canteen has done any great amount of harm in Manila. I think that the evil that we get rid of there is comparatively trifling. But I do believe, and I have believed for a long time, that the people who followed the Army and opened saloons in Manila have done immense harm, and there is nothing that this commission has done better, in my judgment, than the restrictions which they have placed upon the liquor traffic, in a way in which I believe they are gradually limiting it. But I think it is a thing important enough to regulate by law. No man is better in the Tropics for drinking distilled spirits. I suggest this amendment: On page 43, line 7, after the words "United States," strike out the word "is" and insert—

And the importation of distilled spirits into the Philippine Islands or their dependencies, except for medicinal purposes, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioners of the United States, are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not care to continue this discussion. I wish to say, however, one word about the use of intoxicating drinks in the Tropics. It is well known to everyone who has ever given any attention to it that in the Tropics it is quite impossible for men to indulge in the use of intoxicating drinks as they do in the Temperate Zone. It is equally true that in the higher altitudes of this country men can not do that. On high mountains the excessive use of liquors is exceedingly dangerous to life. It is equally dangerous to life in the Tropics. That has been the history of the English occupation of India and of every other tropical country. People do not take to it as we do in the North, and they never have done so. The vice of intemperance is not a vice which is usual in tropical countries, partly, perhaps, because of the domination of one great religious organization—the Mohammedans—who do not use liquor, who, according to their faith, must not use either wine, beer, or strong drink, and because of the fact that everywhere they recognize the danger of its use. So we shall do no harm to our soldiers there, we shall not invade any of their privileges that will be dear to them, if we cut off the use of intoxicating liquors of all kinds in the Philippines, and on every foot of it.

Mr. McCOMAS. I did not clearly understand the Senator from Colorado. Did I understand him to say that he would favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, or an amendment of like import?

Mr. TELLER. I have not had an opportunity to see whether that amendment goes as far as it ought, but as far as it goes I am certainly in favor of it. If it does not go far enough, I shall try to amend it.

Mr. McCOMAS. If I understand the Senator's position, he does not have any serious scruples about the prohibition as to taxes, duties, and imposts being uniform throughout the United States. He is not troubled by the Constitution being a camp follower.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand the point the Senator is making.

Mr. McCOMAS. I mean to say you are not troubled by the question which is now being discussed in the Porto Rican case, by a want of uniformity in duties upon distilled spirits in the ports of the United States and in the ports of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this seems to me to be a very pressing measure, and I am not going into that question. I am waiting to hear what the Supreme Court says on that subject.

Mr. McCOMAS. I wish to say that I shall favor and that I will have no trouble about voting for the amendment proposed. I heartily favor the restriction on the traffic by that drastic means.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rose to appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to offer his amendment as a separate section to the bill. There is now a contest between the friends of the present canteen and those who are opposed to it, and it is very desirable that the issue should be squarely decided.

The Senator from Massachusetts will recognize the fact that if his amendment to the provision prevails, it will put the question into conference and that the Senate will be, as it frequently finds itself, not in the hands of a majority of this body, but in the hands of three men who are the conferees. For that reason I trust the Senator will withdraw his proposed amendment and submit it as a separate section.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to submit it as a separate section.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator to withdraw it for the time being.

Mr. LODGE. I will withdraw it for the time being and submit it as a separate section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts will be withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I am on my feet——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri call for a reading of the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read and offered now, so that we will know it is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was offered and is withdrawn by that Senator for correction.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I will put it in the shape of a new section as soon as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on this question, which I may or may not desire to have acted upon. I have drawn it very hurriedly and it is doubtless very imperfect. I offer the amendment to lie on the table. It need not be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

That all licenses heretofore granted or that may be granted prior to the approval of this act for the establishment of American saloons in the Philippine Archipelago are hereby revoked and annulled, and hereafter no such licenses shall be issued.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire, Mr. President, simply to have inserted in the RECORD by consent, if I can obtain it, the testimony of General Miles, which is found on pages 44 and 45 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, and also——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let it be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that it be read. I shall be pleased to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TUESDAY, December 11, 1900.

Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., commanding the Army, appeared before the committee.

Senator SEWELL. I want to ask you if you approve of the canteen as it is, and whether it has been a good thing in the Army?

General MILES. I think it was on my recommendation that the sale of alcoholic liquors was prohibited in the Army. That was done several years ago. I recommended it to President Hayes, and I have the pen now with which he wrote the order prohibiting the sale of rum, gin, brandy, and whisky. It did not prohibit the sale of light wines and beers. That was a step I thought at that time desirable; that was as far as I was ready to go in that direction, and that order, I think, has been of benefit to the service.

Senator SEWELL. You think that has proved to be a good thing for discipline and satisfies the men, and as a result there is less intemperance than under the old system?

The CHAIRMAN. Fewer offenses and more money saved?

General MILES. The old way was very bad, because the sutler's store was demoralizing, and I asked President Hayes to make that order and he did it, and I have the pen now with which he wrote it. Then, at the commencement of the Spanish war I called attention even to the sale of beer and wine, urging that the department commanders would reduce the use of it as much as possible, particularly in the Tropics, in a general order issued, and that was done. Having it under their absolute control now, they can stop the sale of beer and wine or restrict it.

Senator BURROWS. Who can, General?

General MILES. The department commanders and the Army commanders.

Senator BURROWS. They can abolish the canteen if they see fit?

General MILES. Yes; or they can prohibit the sale of more than one drink in a day if they want to. In fact, I called attention to that in an order I issued at the commencement of the Spanish war. As to whether it would now be advisable to prohibit everything of that kind is a matter you can judge as well as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you say that the establishment of the post exchange as it is now has had a good effect on the Army?

General MILES. I think it is far better than it was before.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now desire to have read General Orders, No. 87, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, July 2, 1898, which was issued by command of Major-General Miles at that date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks to have it read?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 87.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, July 2, 1898.

The Army is engaged in active service under climatic conditions which it has not before experienced.

In order that it may perform its most difficult and laborious duties with the least practicable loss from sickness, the utmost care consistent with prompt and efficient service must be exercised by all, especially by officers.

The history of other armies has demonstrated that in a hot climate abstinence from the use of intoxicating drink is essential to continued health and efficiency.

Commanding officers of all grades and officers of the medical staff will carefully note the effect of the use of such light beverages—wines and beer—as are permitted to be sold at the post and camp exchanges, and the commanders of all independent commands are enjoined to restrict, or to entirely prohibit, the sale of such beverages if the welfare of the troops or the interests of the service require such action.

In this most important hour of the nation's history it is due the Government from all those in its service that they should not only render the most earnest efforts for its honor and welfare, but that their full physical and intellectual force should be given to their public duties, uncontaminated by any indulgences that shall dim, stultify, weaken, or impair their faculties and strength in any particular.

Officers of every grade, by example as well as by authority, will contribute to the enforcement of the order.

By command of Major-General Miles:

H. C. CORBIN, Adjutant-General.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to put the amendment in before he goes on?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I now offer the amendment as a new section, section 41, to follow after the canteen section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Add a new section, to stand as section 37, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 37. The importation or sale of distilled spirits into the Philippine Islands or their dependencies, except for medicinal purposes or for use in the arts under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioners of the United States, is hereby prohibited."

Mr. PERKINS. I also desire to offer an amendment. I ask that it may be read and take the same course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by adding as a new section, to stand as section 38, the following:

SEC. 38. That when any enlisted man of the Army (regular or volunteer), serving in the Philippine Islands, who may, on or before July 1, 1901, be entitled to his discharge and transportation home, reenlists for three years, he shall be paid $100 in lieu of the cost of his transportation to the United States and return of a soldier and the amount of pay and allowances during that period. On the expiration of his second enlistment he shall be entitled to the transportation and allowances to the place of his present enlistment as now provided for by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that General Miles, in common with all the other high officers of our Army, whether they approve or disapprove of this canteen question, are averse especially to having their names made prominent in this debate. At least I assume that to be the fact; and yet, as attention has been called to the attitude of some of these great generals, I felt it incumbent upon me to put in the RECORD the testimony that General Miles gave before the committee. It has been said that he is in favor of the so-called post exchange as it is now conducted. General Miles said nothing of the kind in his testimony. He called attention to a reform that had been wrought at his suggestion—a very important reform—and then he said to the committee, practically, "Gentlemen, the question is up to you; let Congress dispose of it as Congress thinks best."

General Miles, for the most admirable order that he issued at the beginning of the Spanish-American war, is entitled to the thanks of every temperance man and woman in this country. In it he called attention to a fact that is well known to the medical profession, that the use of intoxicating drinks in tropical climates is especially injurious to health, and he very pointedly suggested to his officers that they should exercise great discretion in permitting the use even of light wines and beers, and that if they observed that any harm came from them to prohibit the use entirely.

General Miles is known to some of us as a man who believes in temperance in all things. More than twenty years ago General Miles called attention to the fact that there was not a great manufacturing or railroad corporation or any other corporation in this country that permitted the sale of beer or intoxicants of any kind to its employees on its premises, and for that reason at that time he did not see the necessity of it being sold to a regiment of soldiers. I quite sympathize with that feeling. The Amoskeag corporation in my State employs about 9,000 men in the city of Manchester, and if anybody who is connected with that great corporation should suggest that they could not get men to work for them or that it would be for the benefit of the health of those men to have a beer saloon in that great establishment he would be hooted at.

The great Pennsylvania Railroad, the Boston and Maine Railroad, and all the other great railroads of this country, employing tens of thousands of men, have never thought it necessary to establish saloons in connection with their corporation. And I, for the life of me, can not understand why the boys we send out from New England and other parts of the country to fight our battles should be tempted in this way, and that it should be argued that it is necessary to their comfort and to prevent them from deserting and to encourage their enlistment that we should establish these places where they can procure intoxicating drinks, even of the mildest kind.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate a moment longer.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the Senator's attention to section 17 of the Army reorganization act passed in 1890, which reads as follows:

SEC. 17. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what construction has been put by the Department upon that section?

Mr. GALLINGER. In the observations I made yesterday on this bill, while I did not discuss that matter at length, not caring to do so, I said that the Attorney-General had made a remarkable discovery, and that discovery was that that section did not mean what it said it means.

Mr. President, that amendment was submitted to me before it was offered. I read it carefully, desiring to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in our Army. I approved of the amendment, believing it would accomplish that result if it was passed. It was passed and became a law, and the Attorney-General, the Senator from Colorado this morning said, by putting a semicolon in a place where Congress put a comma, and dividing the section into two parts, proceeded to render an opinion that it did not mean what we intended it should mean, and so the post exchange has continued without regard to that statute.

I will say to the Senator that I have no sympathy whatever with the construction which was put upon that section by the Department of Justice. It certainly was not what the friends of the section intended.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It nullified the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. It nullified the law absolutely and as I think very unjustly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he can conceive of any language that we could use which would be plainer than this?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have said in print, and I have said in certainly one public address, that I do not believe that there is an American citizen capable of writing any plainer language or language more easily understood than that section, and I was astounded at the time and I am equally so now, that any different construction could have been put upon it than that I put upon it at the time I read it.

Mr. BUTLER. What hope does the Senator then see in any legislation which we may enact?

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps the commas will be all right this time and the sentence may not be susceptible of a different punctuation.

Mr. BUTLER. We had better punctuate this seventeenth section of the law and reenact it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I simply desire to say for the information of the Senator from North Carolina that the section now known as the anti-canteen section has been drawn with an idea to overcome the objections that were contained in the decision or the judgment that was passed upon the former section by the Attorney-General, and competent lawyers have agreed, at least those to whom I have talked, that it will pass muster.

Mr. BUTLER. That it will be impossible to construe it away?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That it will be impossible to construe it so as to nullify it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURSTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised at the debate which has occurred upon this bill. The committee have reported a bill to increase the Army of the United States to 100,000 men, undertaking to disguise their purpose by a provision by which the President can reduce the number of privates and corporals to a less number, but the bill provides the officers for 100,000 men. No necessity has been stated by the committee for this increase in the Army. Information is withheld, and the committee make a report which contains nothing of value, except it be a justification for the sale of intoxicating liquors to the Army of the United States. There is nothing else in their report. Page after page is devoted to showing that the sale of liquors to our soldiers is a good thing, and a majority of the committee are willing to come before the Senate and the country with this sort of a document to justify increasing the Army to a hundred thousand men, to justify having more men to place under the influences of the Army canteen and there sell liquor to them.

I supposed there was a minority of this committee. Their voices are silenced; we hear nothing from them. How the minority should have been silenced I know not. Commissions have been abundant in the Army, and the volunteer service finds many relatives of prominent men among their number. The majority of the committee seems to have been engaged principally in trying to defend the President of the United States for violating an act of Congress.

There is no necessity for this legislation prohibiting the Army canteen. We have passed a law upon that subject. It is clear and distinct. There is no possible chance to misunderstand its language. And yet the President of the United States refuses to enforce the law. Pursuing that course, with the same disregard for the law and a disregard for the Constitution, he sets up his authority as superior to everybody's, and withholds from this body the information in his possession necessary to an intelligent discharge of our duties as legislators.

The act of Congress which we passed before, prohibiting the sale of liquor in Army canteens, was not necessary. The power of the President was abundant. An order from him as the Commander in Chief of the Army could have prevented the sale of intoxicating liquors upon the ground occupied by the Army and in every Army canteen throughout the United States. And yet he refused to issue the order, and not only refused, but has since refused to execute the law we passed. To justify this act on his part, the majority of the committee devoted their entire attention to a defense of his action.

What is more, Mr. President, in the hearings before the committee not an Army officer has been subpœnaed to testify to the injurious effects of the sale of liquor to soldiers. Only those were selected who would justify the course of the President, and yet many Army officers have stated to the contrary, as was shown by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] yesterday. But in this document there is not a line from any officer of the Government except those in favor of selling liquor to our soldiers. Why this special plea? What peculiar purpose influenced the majority of the committee to make this special plea to defend and shelter their President, who has violated his duty?

Mr. President, the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, which embraces 10 printed pages, contains the following as a reason why the Army should be increased:

It is impossible to suppose that any intelligent citizens would pretend that an army of 29,000 is sufficient to meet existing requirements. Sixty-nine thousand soldiers must be discharged before July 1, 1901. The work has necessarily commenced already. Invalid soldiers are brought home first. A ship is now on the way with its complement, and ships are to leave twice a month until all are brought home except those who desire to remain in our island possessions as citizens.

If no legislation shall interfere, on the 30th of June the men who enlisted in the Regular Army for three years will have to be mustered out before their time.

To fail now to preserve the Army substantially at its present strength would be to plunge our present position into chaos and to let loose all shames and crimes.

That is all there is on the subject. The remainder of this report, except some tables covering less than a page in relation to the number of men provided by the bill and the number of the Regular Army under existing law, is devoted to the Army canteen. Here is page after page to show why liquor should be continued to be sold in Army posts.

Now, I am not opposed to the canteen; I am simply opposed to the sale of liquor in the Army canteen. Beer is an intoxicant, as any other liquor, if men drink enough of it, and, generally, when men commence and learn to drink the milder intoxicants they follow it up ultimately with the stronger intoxicants. If beer is sold to the boys who enlist, if it is authorized by the Government, if it is declared by Congress to be wholesome and proper, if it is kept where the men all must assemble to have any amusement, the boy who has been taught by his mother that temperance is better for him, and that the use of intoxicants will undermine his health, will conclude that he will do as others do, and thus the canteen becomes a nursery for drunkards and a kindergarten for the crimes that follow the use of more strong intoxicants.

It is said that the canteen keeps the men from the grogshops. Why, Mr. President, the grogshops exist on the borders of the reservation, and the numbers who patronize them will be recruited and increased if you provide that they shall be schooled in intemperance upon the reservation and within the military post itself.

I have heard of no argument, I have seen no evidence, which shows that the use of intoxicating liquors is of advantage to the men. When I asked the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAWLEY] yesterday if there was any testimony that the use of beer was a good thing for the men and conducive to their health, he declined to answer my question. I have looked through the testimony, and there is not a line anywhere which indicates that it would be of advantage to the health of the men. The only argument presented is that intemperance was reduced in the Soldiers' Homes by having beer sold within their walls or upon the premises; but a rule which would apply to the Soldiers' Homes would not apply to the Army.

The men in the Soldiers' Homes are, as a rule, men on an average of over 55 years of age, and their habits are fixed. They are either intemperate or they are not. The influence of the presence of liquor would not induce a man to drink who had been temperate until he had reached such an age, but it is different with the Army. The Army is composed of boys, boys from 17 to 25 years of age; boys who have largely not yet come in contact with the world; boys fresh from their homes, many of them trained and brought up in temperance, taught that it is an evil and an injury to them to indulge in intemperance; and yet this class are to be taught that, with the approval of the President and the approval of Congress, it is their license to commence a course of intemperance by the use of beer in the Army canteen.

As I understand it, the Army canteen is a place where the boys may go and amuse themselves, where they may go to buy extra articles of food. The Senator from North Dakota says that is the post exchange. The Army canteen and the post exchange, as I understand, are synonymous terms, and the same person conducts both; they are together. In the rooms adjoining the post exchange there are tables where the boys may play games and engage in amusements which are entirely harmless. Now, it is proposed by act of Congress to add to that the sale of intoxicating liquors; and a great committee of this body devote their entire time to a justification of this course. They have devoted nearly two days—all of yesterday at least—to a debate to show why this policy of the President should be continued in the future. I have here the law which was passed upon this subject March 2, 1899, a law which remains unenforced, and a law which the President refuses to execute.

SEC. 17. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

I have also the opinion of the Attorney-General upon this subject, which furnished the excuse that the President found for refusing to enforce this law. As I said before, the law was unnecessary. An Executive order could have been issued without the law. Refusing to issue the Executive order, the President had his Attorney-General write an opinion, upon which he based his evasion of the law and refused to execute it.

Mr. SPOONER. Why does the Senator say that the President had his Attorney-General write an opinion against the law?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think he would have gone on and enforced the law according to its clear and specific terms if he had not an Attorney-General to write an excuse.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator should quarrel with the construction placed by the Attorney-General upon the law. Does he suppose that the President directs the Attorney-General to render an opinion construing the law in a certain way?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know whether he does or not.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I would not say so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Attorney-General, addressing the Secretary of War, says:

You request my opinion as to whether the statute above quoted prohibits the continuance of the sale of beer by the Government in the canteen sections of the post exchanges, which are organized and maintained at the various Army posts and encampments throughout the United States. I presume that by "beer" you mean a particular kind of intoxicating drink, and what I shall have to say will refer to that as well as to other "intoxicating drinks," that being the phrase used by the act in question.

In practice the Government commissary stores constituting the regulation ration allowed for the soldiers in each company are required by the War Department to be issued by the commissary officer to the commander of the company, and the commander of the company is (by the same authority) required to have prepared for the mess table of the soldiers only such portion of the same as is found to be necessary at the time, and to sell the remainder and thereby constitute a "company fund" from which to supply the soldiers' mess table with desirable food not contained in the commissary stores drawn by him as regulation rations from the commissary officer, as above stated.

At every post where it is practicable the War Department requires the post commander to institute a post exchange, the capital stock of which is to be made up of contributions from the said funds arising out of the said sales of commissary stores and held by the company commanders, as above stated, and known as company funds. The post exchange is an establishment in which all articles are sold such as soldiers usually buy with the money they spend from their pay, and the establishment is divided up into the following sections:

"(a) A well-stocked general store in which such goods are kept as are usually required at military posts, and as extensive in number and variety as conditions will justify; (b) a well-kept lunch counter supplied with as great a variety of viands as circumstances permit, such as tea, coffee, cocoa, nonalcoholic drinks, soup, fish, cooked and canned meats, sandwiches, pastries, etc; (c) a canteen at which, under the conditions hereinafter set forth, beer and light wines by the drink, and tobacco, may be sold; (d) reading and recreation rooms, supplied with books, periodicals, and other reading matter; billiard and pool tables, bowling alley, and facilities for other proper indoor games, as well as apparatus for outdoor sports and exercises, such as cricket, football, baseball, tennis, etc.; a well-equipped gymnasium, possessing also the requisite paraphernalia for outdoor athletics. At small posts it may be impracticable to maintain all of these sections, but at every exchange there should be no less than two departments—the refreshment, embracing store, lunch counter, and canteen; and the recreation, which includes all the other branches."

The net profits arising from the whole business go to the company funds from which the capital stock was contributed, as above stated, and then are used with the rest of the funds, of course, to improve the soldiers' mess table. All of these transactions are carried on by the Government through the War Department under a branch of the Army Regulations promulgated as Post Exchange Regulations. Under these regulations it becomes the official duty of certain officers at the post to attend to the general direction of the business affairs of the post exchange, including all its sections, and the post commander and other officers are, of course, officially responsible to the Government for the management, discipline, and order of the whole matter. Also the Post Exchange Regulations provided for enlisted men to be detailed, under certain circumstances, as salesmen, etc., in all sections of the post exchange, including the canteen section.

Officers in command of camps, forts, reservations, or other premises used for military purposes have usually exercised the authority (when people desired to sell to soldiers) to allow them to come on the premises to do so, or to refuse to allow them such privileges, in their discretion, and also to dictate or determine what those should or should not sell who were permitted to come on the premises.

The post exchange thus organized and conducted is, in effect, a voluntary association, similar to an unincorporated club, the officers and men composing the garrison constituting the members thereof, and the rules and conduct of the exchange being under the regulation and supervision of the War Department.

The section of the statute referred to consists of three parts or clauses, namely:

1. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen;

2. Nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States;

3. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

The question to be decided is whether this enactment absolutely prohibits the sale of intoxicating drinks in any manner or by any person in any post exchange or canteen, or whether its effect is merely to modify and regulate sales of intoxicating drinks in those places by discontinuance of the custom heretofore followed of detailing enlisted men as salesmen in the canteens.

Then the Attorney-General quotes from many authorities and gives his own opinion as to the construction of the statute.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if he is reading from the opinion of the Attorney-General?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am reading from the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BUTLER. Construing away section 17 of the act of March 2, 1899?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; construing away section 17 of that act. Then he continues:

But the sale of intoxicating drinks in post exchanges and canteens is not the only method in which those commodities are supplied upon premises used for military purposes. As is stated above, officers in command of encampments, forts, reservations, and other premises have usually exercised the authority to allow persons to come upon the premises and sell intoxicating drinks to soldiers, or have exercised the discretion of refusing such privilege. The second clause would seem to relate particularly to this class of persons and to this custom. Given its full effect, it forbids any such license or permission to be granted hereafter by any military officer. I do not think that the second clause of the section is intended to modify or affect in any way the sale of intoxicating drinks in the post exchanges or canteens.

Now let us see what the second clause is:

Nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States.

The Attorney-General says that language is not "intended to modify or affect in any way the sale of intoxicating drinks in the post exchanges or canteens."

It seems to me that a President would hardly need the advice of anybody who could put such a construction upon language used on this or any other subject, unless he was desirous of securing an opinion as an excuse for violating an act of Congress.

Then the Attorney-General says:

Strength is given to this proposition by the third clause, which directs the Secretary of War to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect. If the section was intended to be an absolute prohibitory act, preventing the sale of intoxicating drinks on all Government premises occupied for military purposes, then it would execute itself and would require no general order from the Secretary of War or from anyone else. In the face of a general prohibitory section of that kind such sales would be unlawful and the order of the Secretary would not in any way enhance their illegality. If, however, that interpretation be adopted which separates the first and second clauses and makes the second refer only to sales by persons not connected with post exchanges or canteens, then the third clause of the section becomes intelligible and appropriate and applies to the future sales in post exchanges or canteens. The act having forbidden the employment of soldiers as bartenders or salesmen of intoxicating drinks, it would be lawful and appropriate for the managers of the post exchanges to employ civilians for that purpose. Of course, employment is a matter of contract and not of requirement or permission.

That is the language he uses to evade these words:

Nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States.

The Attorney-General says:

Of course, employment is a matter of contract and not of requirement or permission. The regulation of the post exchanges and canteens being within the power of the Secretary of War, the act means that he shall by order modify the regulations upon that subject so as to make them consistent with the provisions of this act. To that end it will be requisite that he shall determine the question of the persons who may be employed in the post exchanges, and such other conditions and requirements in connection therewith as his good judgment may dictate.

The result of these reflections is, then—

He calls these "reflections"— that this section does not prohibit the continuance of the sale of intoxicating drinks through the canteen sections of the post exchanges as heretofore organized and carried on, except that, of course, no officer or soldier can be put on duty in the canteen section to do the selling, either directly or indirectly. This latter the law clearly prohibits.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand from that decision that the ground on which the Attorney-General held that the law did not prohibit the sale of liquor was because the money which was expended in the purchase of the liquor went back to the soldiers and was reinvested; that it was like a club unincorporated. I should like to know if I am correct in my understanding of that point of the decision, because, if I am correct, I should like to know what is the difference in that situation and that which is presented by the amendment which is now before the Senate? In other words, it is the same condition exactly. I do not see any distinction between them; and I do not see how the Attorney-General, if the matter were submitted to him again, could avoid rendering the same decision regarding this proposed legislation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not understand from the opinion that the Attorney-General puts it on the ground that the post exchange is a club. He puts it on the ground of the construction of the language of the second section of the law—he having divided it into sections. However, I do think that the Attorney-General can, with equal propriety, override the law which we are now about to enact, after having overruled the previous one, and that he can find, "after due reflection," not reason, but words, to express his opinion that the law should not be obeyed.

Mr. MALLORY. The present proposed legislation contains the third paragraph, which was in the other law which the Attorney-General construed, namely, that—

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

It is almost identical with his issuing a general order to carry it into full force and effect.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No; as I understand it, the Attorney-General first declares that no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks. He says the law is clear on that subject. Then he says these words: "Nor shall any other person," etc., do not mean what they say; and he divides the law into three paragraphs. Under the head of "second," he says the language "Nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors" applies to soldiers, civilians, and everybody else "in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States."

It covers everything, and yet the Attorney-General says, "Of course employment is a matter of contract and not of requirement or permission"—not required or allowed, but a contract to sell, and therefore they may sell. Under that construction of the law the President of the United States refused to enforce the act of Congress, and now we are called upon to pass another act. The same Attorney-General may be called upon to render another decision to nullify that, and there will be just as much reason for it, just as much sense for it, and just as much justification for it. If the committee had said, "We already have a law upon this subject and therefore another is not necessary," the report could have been shorter, this debate shorter, and we could have come down to a discussion squarely of the question.

I have examined these hearings, Mr. President. There are two books or pamphlets containing them, I think. The one I hold in my hand relates to the "sale of intoxicating liquors at the Army canteens." It is entirely devoted to that subject. It contains the testimony of many philanthropic people, people who have studied this question, and who came before the committee voluntarily to express their sentiments upon it. It contains the statement of Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, legislative superintendent of the American Anti-Saloon League; the statement of Mrs. Cornelia B. Forbes, of Connecticut; the statement of Mrs. Ella A. Boole, representing a constituency in the State of New York, having a membership of 22,149 women, opposing the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Army canteen; the statement of Mary H. Hunt, representing the mothers of the United States; the statement of Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, of the Northwestern Christian Temperance Union, superintendent of legislation in favor of abolishing the sale of liquor in the Army canteens; the statement of Miss Leitch; the statement of Rev. W. F. Crafts; the statement of Mrs. Ella M. Thatcher, of Florence, N. J.; the statement of Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson; the statement of Mrs. M. Kells, president of the Mississippi Woman's Christian Temperance Union; the statement of Mrs. Ingalls, of Missouri, and the statement of Miss Belle Kearney, of Mississippi.

I shall not read the testimony of these people, because I think it is unnecessary, although the committee did not furnish this testimony until after the debate upon this bill had commenced and there has been little opportunity to examine it. These statements are all in favor of abolishing the sale of liquor in the canteen.

Then follow the statements of Rev. Oliver C. Miller, chaplain, voluntarily attached to the Fourth United States Cavalry, and of Army officers, all in favor of continuing the present practice except the statement of General Miles, which, while he does not express an opinion, clearly indicates that he believes, having abolished the use of alcoholic liquors in the canteens, the time has now come to abolish the sale of wine and beer. Although many Army officers have made statements showing the injurious effect of the sale of beer and wine, the Committee on Military Affairs did not choose to subpœna any of these officers or take their statements or their testimony. They seem to have been especially desirous of making a case to justify the course of their President.

I do not know that I care to discuss this question further, except to say that this legislation is unnecessary. The power is ample to deal with this question, both by act of Congress and by the power lodged in the President as commander of the Army. I do not think it is necessary to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, as I do not believe we should legislate with regard to the people in the Philippines, and as we have no authority there; but in consequence of the war power and as martial law has been declared in Manila, the President can abolish every saloon in that city. He can prevent the importation of alcoholic liquors and their sale, and, although I shall vote for the House provision in the bill prohibiting the sale of beer in Army canteens, I shall feel that I am voting for unnecessary legislation, if the officers of the Government would enforce existing laws and exercise the power which they now possess.

As long as they refuse to do that they advertise to the American people and to the world that if the boys enlist they are to be subjected to the almost forced habit of using intoxicating liquors, for no boy who visits the Army canteen and enjoys its amusements can avoid, without great mental discomfort to himself, the following of that practice set by older members of the Army. So long as this practice continues, the President of the United States says to the mothers of the United States, "We will subject your boys to the pressure, not alone the temptation, of becoming drunkards, and we will furnish the school and the opportunity."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I recall the matter the Senator from Florida interrogated the Senator from South Dakota as to whether or not if we passed this bill as it came from the House of Representatives the Attorney-General would not nullify the law on the same ground that he did the provision that was in the last military appropriation bill. I will say in reference to that point that I have been informed that the present provision in the bill is drawn in the precise language used by the Attorney-General in his decision when he suggested the form in which the amendment should have been drawn to have made it operative. So there is no danger on that score.

Mr. President, as this matter of the opinion of the Attorney-General has been discussed, and I have received a good many letters first and last concerning it, I simply desire to have incorporated in the RECORD without reading first a promulgation by the Adjutant-General, under date of March 2, calling attention to the provision in the last Army appropriation act; then a letter to the Attorney-General by George D. Meiklejohn, the Assistant Secretary of War, asking for his interpretation of the law; next the opinion of the Attorney-General, and next the General Order, No. 69, of the Adjutant-General, conveying to the Army the opinion of the Attorney-General or its substance. The papers will be found on pages 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, and 92 of the Annual Report of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and I ask that they may be put in the RECORD.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have them read if they are not long.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are very long, occupying 5 pages. The Senator read a part of the papers.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be printed in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

On the 2d of March, 1899, the same being section 17 of the act entitled "An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," Congress enacted the following provision:

"SEC. 17. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect."

In accordance with the concluding sentence of the above-mentioned act, the following was published to the Army under date of March 10, 1899 (General Orders, No. 38):

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 38.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 10, 1899.

II. By direction of the Secretary of War, the following extract from an act of Congress is published for the information and government of all concerned:

"An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 17. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

"Approved, March 2, 1899."

By command of Major-General Miles:

H. C. CORBIN, Adjutant-General.

As a consequence of this publication, a large number of inquiries reached this office asking for an interpretation of the act in question; whether or not the sale of beer is absolutely prohibited; whether the Department will entertain exceptions; whether the rule applied to military camps where canteens were conducted and where there was no post exchange, and, among others, from the Board of Commissioners of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers as to whether the War Department construed the act in question as prohibiting the sale of beer at such Homes. For the purpose of determining the question, and in accordance with provisions of law (sections 356 and 357, Revised Statutes) which authorize the Secretary of War to require the opinion of the Attorney-General whenever a question of law arises in the administration of the Department of War the cognizance of which is not given by statute to some other officer from whom the head of the Department may require advice, the following letter was addressed to the Attorney-General:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 24, 1899.

SIR: In practice the Government commissary stores constituting the regulation ration allowed for the soldiers in each company are required by the War Department to be issued by the commissary officer to the commander of the company, and the commander of the company is (by the same authority) required to have prepared for the mess table of the soldiers only such portion of the same as is found to be necessary at the time, and to sell the remainder and thereby constitute a "company fund" from which to supply the soldiers' mess table with desirable food not contained in the commissary stores drawn by him as regulation rations from the commissary officer, as above stated.

At every post where it is practicable the War Department required the post commander to institute a post exchange, the capital stock of which to be made up of contributions from the said funds arising out of the said sales of commissary stores and held by the company commanders, as above stated, and known as company funds. The post exchange is an establishment in which all articles are sold such as soldiers usually buy with the money they spend from their pay, and the establishment is divided up into the following sections:

"(a) A well-stocked general store, in which such goods are kept as are usually required at military posts, and as extensive in number and variety as conditions will justify; (b) a well-kept lunch counter, supplied with as great a variety of viands as circumstances permit, such as tea, coffee, cocoa, nonalcoholic drinks, soup, fish, cooked and canned meats, sandwiches, pastries, etc.; (c) a canteen at which, under the conditions hereinafter set forth, beer and light wines by the drink, and tobacco, may be sold; (d) reading and recreation rooms, supplied with books, periodicals, and other reading matter, billiard and pool tables, bowling alley, and facilities for other proper indoor games, as well as apparatus for outdoor sports and exercises, such as cricket, football, baseball, tennis, etc., a well-equipped gymnasium, possessing also the requisite paraphernalia for outdoor athletics. At small posts it may be impracticable to maintain all of these sections, but at every exchange there should be no less than two departments—the refreshment, embracing store, lunch counter, and canteen; and the recreation, which includes all the other branches."

The net profits arising from the whole business go to the company funds from which the capital stock was contributed, as above stated, and then are used with the rest of the funds, of course, to improve the soldiers' mess table. All of these transactions are carried on by the Government through the War Department under a branch of the Army Regulations promulgated as Post Exchange Regulations. Under these regulations it becomes the official duty of certain officers at the post to attend to the general direction of the business affairs of the post exchange, including all its sections, and the post commander and other officers are, of course, officially responsible to the Government for the management, discipline, and order of the whole matter. Also, the Post Exchange Regulations provided for enlisted men to be detailed, under certain circumstances, as salesmen, etc., in all sections of the post exchange, in cluding the canteen section.

Officers in command of camps, forts, reservations, or other premises used for military purposes have usually exercised the authority (when people desired to sell to soldiers) to allow them to come on the premises to do so, or to refuse to allow them such privileges, in their discretion, and also to dictate or determine what those should or should not sell who were permitted to come on the premises.

Your attention is invited to section 17 of the act entitled "An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1899. It is as follows:

"That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect."

You are respectfully requested to render an opinion as to whether this statute prohibits the continuance of the sale of beer by the Government in the canteen sections of the post exchanges as described above, except, of course, that no officer or soldier can be put on duty in the canteen section to do the selling, either directly or indirectly, for it is clear that the law prohibits this.

Very respectfully,

G. D. MEIKLEJOHN,
Acting Secretary of War.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

To which he made the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1899.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: Section 17 of the act entitled "An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1899, provides as follows:

"That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect."

You request my opinion as to whether the statute above quoted prohibits the continuance of the sale of beer by the Government in the canteen sections of the post exchanges, which are organized and maintained at the various Army posts and encampments throughout the United States. I presume that by "beer" you mean a particular kind of intoxicating drink, and what I shall have to say will refer to that as well as to other "intoxicating drinks," that being the phrase used by the act in question.

In practice the Government commissary stores constituting the regulation ration allowed for the soldiers in each company are required by the War Department to be issued by the commissary officer to the commander of the company, and the commander of the company is (by the same authority) required to have prepared for the mess table of the soldiers only such portion of the same as is found to be necessary at the time, and to sell the remainder and thereby constitute a "company fund" from which to supply the soldiers' mess table with desirable food not contained in the commissary stores drawn by him as regulation rations from the commissary officer, as above stated.

All of these transactions are carried on by the Government through the War Department under a branch of the Army Regulations promulgated as post-exchange regulations. Also, the post exchange regulations provided for enlisted men to be detailed, under certain circumstances, as salesmen, etc., in all sections of the post exchange, including the canteen section.

Officers in command of camps, forts, reservations, or other premises used for military purposes have usually exercised the authority (when people desired to sell to soldiers) to allow them to come on the premises to do so, or to refuse to allow them such privileges in their discretion, and also to dictate or determine what those should or should not sell who were permitted to come on the premises.

The post exchange thus organized and conducted is, in effect, a voluntary association, similar to an unincorporated club, the officers and men composing the garrison constituting the members thereof, and the rules and conduct of the exchange being under the regulation and supervision of the War Department.

The section of the statute referred to consists of three parts or clauses, namely:

1. That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen;

2. Nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States.

3. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

The question to be decided is whether this enactment absolutely prohibits the sale of intoxicating drinks in any manner or by any person in any post exchange or canteen, or whether its effect is merely to modify and regulate sales of intoxicating drinks in those places by discontinuance of the custom heretofore followed of detailing enlisted men as salesmen in the canteens.

In order to solve this question and determine which is the proper construction, it is not permissible to resort to the debates in Congress, nor to refer to any particular remarks made by members of Congress at the time this provision was before that body for action. It is a rule of construction that what may be called the parliamentary history of an enactment is wisely inadmissible to explain its meaning. Its language can be regarded only as the language of the three branches of the legislative establishment, namely, the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President, and the meaning attached to it by its framers or by the members of either House can not control the construction of it. The opinion held or expressed by one or more members of Congress may or may not have been those entertained by the more than 400 members who gave no such expression. The declaration of some and the assumed acquiescence of others therein can not be adopted as a true interpretation of the statute. (Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 41.)

This doctrine of construction has frequently been stated and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States. See United States vs. Freight Association (166 U. S., 290, 318), where the earlier cases in that court are cited, and the following language is used by Mr. Justice Peckham:

"Debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other, the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed."

Another rule of interpretation that must be applied in the construction of this statute is that no part of an act shall be regarded as meaningless or superfluous if a construction can be legitimately found which will preserve it and make it effectual. A construction of a statute which would leave without effect any part of the language should not be made, unless it is otherwise impossible to give a reasonable and consistent construction of the act. It is to be presumed that in enacting a law the legislature means precisely what it says, and the effort of the interpreter should be to give force and effect to every word, paragraph, and section of the act. (Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 29.)

If this act was intended to be entirely prohibitory of the sale of intoxicating drinks in post exchanges or canteens, as well as in encampments, forts, and other premises used for military purposes, then, to say the least, Congress used a very circuitous route to reach that point and employed many superfluous words to enact a simple provision which could have been stated in a single sentence declaring that hereafter no intoxicating drinks should be dealt in or sold in any post exchange or canteen or any premises used for military purposes by the United States. The act does not make any such declaration. On the contrary, the first clause merely forbids the detail of an officer or private soldier to act as a bartender or otherwise in the sale of intoxicating drinks in any post exchange or canteen. Why specify officers and private soldiers as forbidden if it was intended to forbid the traffic by all other persons?

The designation of one class of individuals as forbidden to do a certain thing raises a just inference that all other classes not mentioned are not forbidden. A declaration that soldiers shall not be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks in post exchanges necessarily implies that such sale is not unlawful when conducted by others than soldiers. If a statute were to provide that no liquors should be sold to minors in any saloon, would not everyone infer that the enactment was predicated upon a state of law which, as to others than minors, allowed the sale of liquor in saloons? As all parts of the act must be given effect according to their natural sense and meaning, if possible, it becomes necessary to attach to this first clause, therefore, a signification which implies that the sale of liquor in post exchanges is not unlawful when conducted by others than soldiers. Certainly, standing by itself, it can receive no other or broader meaning than that officers or private soldiers are not to be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks.

But the sale of intoxicating drinks in post exchanges and canteens is not the only method in which those commodities are supplied upon premises used for military purposes. As is stated above, officers in command of encampments, forts, reservations, and other premises have usually exercised the authority to allow persons to come upon the premises and sell intoxicating drinks to soldiers, or have exercised the discretion of refusing such privilege. The second clause would seem to relate particularly to this class of persons and to this custom. Given its full effect, it forbids any such license or permission to be granted hereafter by any military officer. I do not think that the second clause of the section is intended to modify or affect in any way the sale of intoxicating drinks in the post exchanges or canteens. That is dealt with and covered by the first clause. The second clause relates entirely to a different matter.

Strength is given to this proposition by the third clause, which directs the Secretary of War to issue such general order as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect. If the section was intended to be an absolute prohibitory act, preventing the sale of intoxicating drinks on all Government premises occupied for military purposes, then it would execute itself and would require no general order from the Secretary of War or from anyone else. In the face of a general prohibitory section of that kind such sales would be unlawful, and the order of the Secretary would not in any way enhance their illegality. If, however, that interpretation be adopted which separates the first and second clauses and makes the second refer only to sales by persons not connected with post exchanges or canteens, then the third clause of the section becomes intelligible and appropriate, and applies to the future sales in post exchanges or canteens. The act having forbidden the employment of soldiers as bartenders or salesmen of intoxicating drinks, it would be lawful and appropriate for the managers of the post exchanges to employ civilians for that purpose.

Of course, employment is a matter of contract and not of requirement or permission. The regulation of the post exchanges and canteens being within the power of the Secretary of War, the act means that he shall by order modify the regulations upon that subject so as to make them consistent with the provisions of this act. To that end it will be requisite that he shall determine the question of the persons who may be employed in the post exchanges and such other conditions and requirements in connection therewith as his good judgment may dictate.

The result of these reflections is, then, that this section does not prohibit the continuance of the sale of intoxicating drinks through the canteen sections of the post exchanges as heretofore organized and carried on, except that, of course, no officer or soldier can be put on duty in the canteen section to do the selling, either directly or indirectly. This latter the law clearly prohibits.

Very respectfully, JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General.

In accordance with this opinion, an order was published to the Army quoting the opinion of the Attorney-General as above cited and concluding as follows:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 69. HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, April 12, 1899.

1. The following opinion of the Attorney-General, and orders of the Secretary of War based thereon, are published for the information and guidance of all concerned:

* * * * * * *

2. The provision of paragraph 3 of the post-exchange regulations (General Orders, No. 46, 1895, from this office), to the effect that "in establishing a new exchange, and at posts where the business is small, the steward and attendants may be enlisted men," is revoked so far as the canteen section is concerned, so that the said paragraph will hereafter be authority for the employment of civilians only in the canteen.

So much of paragraph 10 of the said exchange regulations as requires that "the canteen must be in a room used for no other purpose, and, when practicable, in a building apart from that in which the recreation and reading rooms are located; the sale of beer must be limited to week days, and the beer consumed upon the premises;" and that "the practice known as 'treating' will not be permitted," is amended by the additions thereto of the provisions that no officer shall be assigned, nor any private soldier detailed, to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange, or canteen, and that such sales shall be made only by civilians employed for that purpose; and the requirements of said paragraph 10 of the exchange regulations, to the effect that "the sale or use of ardent spirits in any branch of the exchange is strictly prohibited," is emphasized, and also extended so as to apply to any encampment or fort or premises used for military purposes.

3. No person shall be required, permitted, or allowed to sell liquors of any kind, character, or description in any encampment or fort or any premises used for military purposes by the United States; and commanding officers are especially enjoined to see that this prohibition is strictly enforced, and that the sales of liquors in the canteens are confined to the sales of beer and light wines by civilians employed in the canteen for the purpose by the proper Government authorities.

By command of Major-General Miles:

H. C. CORBIN, Adjutant-General.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have read, as part of my remarks, a pamphlet which I hold in my hand upon this subject. It seems to me to outline an ideal canteen, and I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

As the question is being asked, "What can we offer to take the place of the Army canteen?" we beg to offer the following proposition, which was presented at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs December 7, 1900.

PROPOSITION TO THE UNITED STATES WAR DEPARTMENT.

[By Sergt. Francis H. Buzzacot, of Chicago, Ill.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to respectfully tender my services and such an amount as is necessary, not to exceed $5,000, to be expended by me or under my direction, for the purpose of erecting and establishing a model Army temperance canteen, to be conducted under military regulations, for the recreation, benefit, and modern advantages of such United States volunteer troops as are now serving in the Philippines.

In this temperance canteen there will be sold, on a scale lower than prevailing market prices, all such articles and comforts that troops in tropical camps require; to supply many of such articles as books, literature, games, all free of cost (in short, to provide anything that is right and proper), except liquors or intoxicants; absolutely nothing of this nature to be permitted or disposed of in its vicinity.

This temperance canteen will be capable of accommodating 1,000 men under its portable canvas roof. It will be floored, ventilated, and equipped with a general store for the disbursement of such goods as are approved of by the War Department. It will be provided with reading and writing tables, recreation tables, benches, music, pictorial magazines, and will be absolutely free to our soldier boys for their comfort, entertainment, and accommodation at all such times as they have for recreation when off duty. Neat and tasty lunch counters will be erected and maintained for the serving of hot tea, coffee, chocolate, fresh milk, iced tea, lemonade, and such drinks as will be beneficial to troops instead of hurtful to them. The serving of light lunches of a nature to relieve the monotonous effect of the Army ration will be encouraged.

Athletic games will be furnished, baseball and football outfits provided and loaned to the troops on all proper occasions, when time permits, and thus supplied to the men free.

In this temperance canteen and its establishment and equipment I proffer my services until its erection and complete organization; whereupon I shall make full and complete presentation of same to the Government, through such commanding officer as the Honorable Secretary of War directs, absolutely free of debt or any expense whatever to the Government or troops, asking only that upon its successful existence that the United States Government will so maintain it, as a strictly temperance canteen, wherever it can be of service to bodies of troops who remain in the camp or field.

It is to be understood also that all profits arising from the sale of everything will be strictly accounted for (less a reasonable percentage for running expenses), and the entire balance to be used for the purpose and issue to the troops or commands who patronize this canteen in such a way as will relieve the monotony of camp fare and rations and best add to the comfort, benefit, health, and moral advancement of the troops abroad. Lastly, that a small percentage be set aside for the sole purpose of extending the movement and reestablishing other temperance canteens elsewhere, thus letting the good work go on.

Religious or song services could also be held here, and what more fitting place could be found for a regiment and its music than in a temperance canteen amidst the heart of a camp of our soldier boys?

It is to be hoped that the Secretary of War will, with other Departments, look well into this offer. There should be unison in one fair effort to establish a model Army temperance canteen, which would be a source of comfort and convenience to the boys and a credit to those who indorse such a movement.

Surely it will be appreciated by the men, for is it not a twofold benefit and a credit to them? In conclusion, I beg in support of my offer to state that an experience of over ten years in the Regular and Volunteer armies (both in peace and war) acquaints me with the actual requirements of soldiers in the field, and I trust will in a small measure contribute to the success of the temperance canteen.

For your information I may add that during the Spanish-American war I presented to my regiment, the Third Illinois Infantry, a complete temperance canteen on the lines herein indicated, and the records will show that in several months' existence it grew to be the largest temperance canteen ever established, capable of accommodating an entire regiment and band for church service. Its profits cleared its original cost and amounted in all to $5,000 (in but a few months' time), all of which was turned over to my regiment and distributed and used by its various companies during its campaign in the Tropics.

At this camp 20,000 troopers visited and patronized it. I refer with pride to these facts simply to indicate what can be done by a soldier alone. With its recognition and cooperation by the Secretary of War and other Departments, I will strive to repeat and extend its influences with a credit to every man and soldier concerned, and I will cheerfully pay every dollar necessary for its establishment.

I believe such a movement will be indorsed by every Christian temperance association in the United States. Mothers, sisters, and men have long since urged reform in Army canteens.

There is a way to do away with the beer canteen. Put in its place something better, something so vastly superior and elevating that will make American soldier boys proud of their own institution. Let there be a respectable, honorable temperance canteen and it will reflect both on the service and men and honor those who sanction and aid the movement. I feel, sir, that I have said enough. What is most needed is to go to work.

I respectfully urge the indorsement of this offer by the honorable Secretary of War, the generals commanding the various departments, and whosoever is for a model Army temperance canteen. If this offer is accepted, I will personally establish it at any point in the Philippines, where a large body of troops is stationed. Then let the results accomplished speak for themselves.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

FRANCIS H. BUZZACOT,

Late Fifth United States Cavalry, late Fifteenth United States Infantry, Sergeant, United States Volunteer Infantry, Porto Rico Campaign.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF WAR,
(Through the Adjutant-General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I thought this question was settled when we voted on the Army bill which was enacted March 2, 1899; but we have had a most remarkable decision by the chief law officer of the Government to the effect that Congress did not know what it wanted when it enacted that. As technical as many of the sections of the bill are and as plain as that section is, it is very strange that it is the only section which it was thought necessary by the War Department to call upon the Attorney-General to construe, and his construction was a wonderful intellectual feat. On account of his decision, which nullified the law, we have the whole question up again. It was considered important enough by the committee which reported the present bill to devote nearly all of their report to the canteen question, and to have many copies of the hearings on that question printed separately for distribution, on the ground, as explained by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], that it was thought that the public was not interested in any other part of the bill, but that the country was intensely interested about this section. In fact, it was considered so important by the Administration that an eminent bishop, I understand, was brought down to Washington to be conferred with about it, and he has furnished an opinion in favor of the canteen as one of the greatest civilizers known to the religious world. That opinion is published in the report. In fact, the opinion occupies nearly all of the last half of the report, and it is all a special plea for the humanizing, civilizing, Christianizing effect of beer.

There are many other good people in this country, equally as good as those the Archbishop speaks of, and probably more numerous, who do not agree with him. They have diametrically opposite views. Some of them appeared before the committee, and some of their testimony is in the report of the hearings. The representative of the Anti-Saloon League, who is stationed in Washington, was before the committee, and it seems that after a brief hearing he was requested or permitted to add to his testimony and file it with the committee for publication in the hearing. As I understand it, he sent the matter that he wished to present, representing his people, in two installments, and the first installment got into the hearing, and the latter installment, arriving probably a little too late, delayed a day or two, was not printed. Therefore the case as presented by those opposed to the canteen and by the official representative of the Anti-Saloon League is not given in the hearing in full.

Inasmuch as this section has been made the most important part of the bill, it seems to me entirely proper, as well as just to the people interested, that the case as made out by those opposed to the canteen should be fully put before the Senate. I have had furnished to me by the representative of the Anti-Saloon League the remainder of the matter that he intended to go into the hearing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to ask a question for information. Does the Senator propose to add all that to the hearing in addition to the testimony given?

Mr. BUTLER. We have had put before us everything on the other side, it seems, that the Government could get, and the report is devoted almost entirely to the canteen.

Mr. HAWLEY. We have had more evidence against the canteen than for it. A very large body of good women came here and had a hearing, and many of them made very good speeches. The committee excluded nobody who wanted to testify.

Mr. BUTLER. I had not charged that, because I did not know it was so, but I stated the facts as I understand them. The representatives of the Anti-Saloon League had a conference in Washington I think on the 19th of December, and had representatives here who represented probably eight to ten million people. That is what they claim.

Mr. HAWLEY. What body is that?

Mr. BUTLER. The Anti-Saloon League. They had a conference here in December last. They appointed a representative to appear before the committee and present their reasons. They wanted to offer a kind of section to the bill that they thought would not be construed away by the Attorney-General. In fact, they were shrewd and intelligent enough and diligent enough to pick out from the Attorney-General's opinion the words which he himself suggested could not be construed away. In that opinion he stated that if section 17 in the bill that we passed last year had employed certain words he could not have construed it away. He practically stated that. And so they selected just those words and got them incorporated in the bill in the House.

Their representative put a great deal of valuable information before the committee, and it seems that the committee asked him, after a brief hearing, to file with the committee his brief. The representative sent it in in two installments. The first installment reached the committee, it seems, in time and was published. The latter installment, as I have already stated, reached the committee a few days later, but was not printed. Probably it was too late; probably the matter had been sent to the printer. We have, therefore, only a small part of their argument in the hearing. I have the remainder of it here. It seems to me that they represent enough people to be entitled to a hearing about a matter that has been made the most important part of the bill, and surely the time of the Senate would not be wasted——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator please let me make an inquiry of him? Is the agent of the Anti-Saloon League that he refers to Mr. Dinwiddie?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. He has seven pages of testimony in the book. He appeared before the committee. He was very welcome. He talked until he was tired or as long as he wanted to.

Mr. BUTLER. I have already stated—the Senator probably did not hear me—that I have been informed by him that he was given permission or was requested, probably, by the committee, after a brief hearing, to file with the committee a statement of facts and arguments which the Anti-Saloon League wanted to put before the committee in support of the anti-canteen amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Perhaps this is what the Senator refers to. Somebody did ask to put in some more testimony, and was given notice that it must be in by Saturday, because the testimony was to be printed; it could not wait, and it did not come. I do not know when it did come.

Mr. BUTLER. That conforms with what he informed me. He sent it by mail, I think. At any rate, he thought himself that probably he was to blame for being a day late, but still he did not want his people not represented, and he did not want the report which is now before us to be the only hearing that they would have, it being only a partial statement of the case.

Mr. HAWLEY. I remarked that he has seven pages here. He made a very good speech.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I think myself it is very good, as far as it goes.

Mr. HAWLEY. And then he failed to come to time on some other papers that we know nothing about.

Mr. BUTLER. There is the trouble. The distinguished Senator who is chairman of the committee is in ignorance of part of the argument and facts that the Anti-Saloon League want to put before him. It is their misfortune, and his misfortune probably, and the misfortune of the country, as far as the temperance question goes, that they did not get it in this report, so many copies of which have been called for and distributed over the country. Now, it is to remedy that misfortune as far as possible that I wish to get the matter together.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I will be in duty bound to object to this very late addition of a large mass of matter when the man might have given it all when he had his hearing. I do object to making a bulky book when it is not needed, because we should get down to the grain. The chaff has been abundantly thrashed over and over.

Mr. BUTLER. Congress has expressed itself on this important question, and its expression is now a statute. It has been construed away by an executive officer, and now we are here legislating on this important question again, and it is attempted to pass legislation that can not be construed away. The distinguished Senator who is chairman of the committee brings in a report here advising Congress to reverse itself and to be convinced that the Attorney-General was right when he told us in his opinion that we did not know what we wanted or what the country wanted, and now he seems to be impatient that anybody should want to present any further argument or reasons why we should adhere to the law that we passed before and try to put it in such shape as will be satisfactory to the Attorney-General. The amendment that is pending is in the words practically recommended by the Attorney-General or which he stated would have been sufficient to prevent him from construing it away.

I do not understand what the Senator means when he says that he objects to my furnishing this information. I have not made any request up to date, but I am going to make one, and that is that this matter be put altogether before the Senate. What is in the report now is short. This [exhibiting] follows it. In fact, the first sentence in the new matter begins by discussing the last paragraph in the matter that is in the report. It is not at all intelligible separate. I ask the Secretary to read the brief part which is in the report, and I wish to take up and discuss this matter to follow it, so that it will be altogether in the RECORD. I do not see how we can well put it altogether in this report without reprinting it, and it would be after the bill has passed probably before we would get it. Of course they would be very glad to have it altogether in this report, but the easiest way to get it altogether is to get it in the RECORD, and that is the quickest way. I ask the Secretary to read Mr. Dinwiddie's statement as far as it is printed in the report, beginning on page 26, down to the marked place on page 31, where the new matter will come in to follow it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the view of the Senator, it is that in the printed report a part of a statement made by the gentleman who represented a large body of people is printed and another part of it is not printed.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, would it not satisfy the Senator and the Senate to allow the part which is not printed to be appended to what is printed and incorporate it in the document or in the RECORD?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that that is what the Senator wants.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand him now to ask that several pages be read, and then——

Mr. BUTLER. And then a part of this matter to follow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let those pages be incorporated without reading likewise.

Mr. BUTLER. I have just explained, as it will appear, that the matter is so connected that where the new matter begins it discusses the matter that is now in the report.

Mr. ALLISON. And my suggestion is that the matter which is now in the report shall be incorporated, and that the new matter shall follow it in the RECORD. That would cover the idea, it seems to me.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator speaks in a very indefinite way about these people, somebody he supposes I am speaking of. Does not the Senator know of the Anti-Saloon League and the eminent gentlemen who are at the head of it?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; I heard the Senator's statement as to who these people are.

Mr. BUTLER. A distinguished gentleman from the Senator's own State is the president of this league, an ex-Congressman, a man who was Indian Commissioner under President Harrison.

Mr. ALLISON. I was endeavoring to promote what the Senator desires to do. I am in favor of doing just what I understand him to propose, namely, to get this whole matter in a connected form in the RECORD. I want to promote his wish in that regard, but I did hope that it might be done without occupying any great length of time. We can all read it in the RECORD in the morning. But I will not make that suggestion now.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to offer a solution of this question. I propose a reprint of all we have printed, and then to put in addition to it, "The following is matter intended by the committee, but it arrived too late." I suggest that it be printed with that heading, that it is additional matter intended by the committee, but it failed to reach it.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has now before his committee this very matter that I have here, or most of it. I have all of it. I regret very much that he did not have it printed with that heading, if it came too late, and furnish it to us. He considered that it was not worth printing after getting it. It may have been one day late, but it is lying now in the committee room in a pigeonhole somewhere. It has not been used; it has not been put before us.

Mr. HAWLEY. The clerk of the committee thinks it has been taken away; that it was not left there.

Mr. BUTLER. If it was taken away, it was taken away after the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League were informed that it would not be printed or incorporated in the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer to let it be printed now. That will suit the Senator. But I want to have him tell the truth about it and say that it is additional matter, that it goes in by unanimous consent, having failed to reach the committee in time.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I think that is the fact.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is fair to do that.

Mr. BUTLER. I think probably that it reached the committee later than the day named by them. I stated that twice.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will you put that in the heading of this additional matter?

Mr. BUTLER. I would be very glad to have it printed that way if it were practicable, but the trouble is, as I have stated twice, that the part which is published in the RECORD is unfinished; it breaks right off. It was sent in two installments.

Mr. HAWLEY. Add these pages to it, only saying it was matter intended by the committee, but failed to reach it.

Mr. BUTLER. The first sentence of the new matter begins by discussing where the last sentence of the other stops off, and you will have it disconnected. I was trying to get it in the RECORD as the best solution of the question, so that we would have the matter all together.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will not be independent of what was sent abroad.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended to ask (I did not suppose the Senator would object) to have it printed as a supplement later, to go out with all this matter; but I want the RECORD to contain it all. We shall probably have a vote on this question this afternoon, and I have never seen the propriety of closing the stable door when the horse is out. If the matter is worth anything at all, it is worth something now, as far as practical value is concerned, on this vote. It may not be worth anything to-morrow, after we have voted, except for the information of the country. It will not then be worth anything for the information of the Senate as far as it affects anyone's vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will go out, of course, with the 15,000 copies of the whole body of testimony?

Mr. BUTLER. It is desirable it should. I think it ought. I think these people are entitled to have it go out.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not object to that. I ask only one condition, that it shall be put on as an appendix and say that it is matter intended by the committee which unfortunately failed to reach them in time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if that is the fact, and of course these people were informed that that was fact by the committee, that it came to them too late, then I think the committee ought to publish it as a supplement and let it go along with the report; and in any reprint it ought to be embodied in the proper place, which could be done.

Mr. TOWNE. With a footnote.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; with a footnote, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] suggests, stating the facts. I will state what I understood to be the facts. The Senator knows, and he is the proper person to state those facts. I think it is due to the large number of people in this country who are deeply interested in this question that it should be printed. For the purposes of this vote, however, that will not answer, because this matter ought to be before us before we vote. Therefore I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What is it?

Mr. HAWLEY. Some belated testimony of the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What does the Senator from North Carolina desire to have read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will state.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to have read that part of the testimony, a small part of it, by Mr. Dinwiddie, representing the Anti-Saloon League, which is now in the report, and then this matter to follow it, because the first sentence in the new matter begins by discussing extracts and facts set forth above, and that is the only way we can have it placed before us intelligently.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator that he request that it be inserted in the RECORD consecutively, allowing the unprinted portion of Mr. Dinwiddie's statement to be published following that portion which has been printed. Will it not satisfy the Senator to have it published in the RECORD and also to have it published after that in the 15,000 copies of the hearings?

Mr. BUTLER. The chairman of the committee has already agreed to do that, which I am very glad that he suggested, but, Mr. President, we should not trifle with a great question and with the millions of people who are interested in this subject. We simply want to get something in the RECORD to send out to our constituents and let them see it there and know that we had it before us, not to stick it in without reading. Here is a question that we are going to vote on. These people hope to appeal to our hearts and consciences by certain facts and data. Now, we are about to vote. It is treating this great question lightly and improperly and it is not becoming the dignity of the Senate to just push the matter into the RECORD, so that to-morrow morning, if we want, after we vote, we may read it. We are now about to vote. Here is something in the nature of a petition from 10,000,000 people—for this league represents that many, I understand—and millions of other people who agree with them, and is it said that what they want to put before us should not be heard by us before we vote? The Senator surely would not treat their petition in that way.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not wish to see a mass of matter that I know nothing about put in now as testimony before the committee, when we never heard it in committee, and without an answer. There may be things in it that ought to be commented upon, and that would have been commented upon in the committee room if the papers had reached there in time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, that is unfortunate. We will not stop to discuss who is to blame for the matter not getting there in time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not blaming anybody; it might have been an accident through missing a train or something of that sort; but I simply wish it stated there that this addendum is composed of matter intended for the committee, but it failed to reach here in time to be read by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. The statement of the chairman will go into the RECORD. He has just made it and it will be a part of the permanent record of the Government, and that is sufficient, it seems to me, to set the committee right and everybody else. I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read what the Senator from North Carolina has requested shall be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Statement of Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, national superintendent of the legislative department of the American Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there are several Senators here this morning who were not present yesterday, and I think for the purpose of making our object clear we should state to you just what is before the committee.

The amendment to the Army bill, section 40, which is really before you for consideration, is as follows:

"SEC. 40. The sale of or dealing in beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors by any person in any post exchange, or canteen, or Army transport, or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States, is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect."

This is designed to correct the difficulty which has existed almost two years past in an amendment to the Army reorganization bill, approved March 2, 1899, in which it was intended to cover this point and prohibit absolutely the sale of liquors in the military establishment. The language, it seems, did not cover the case. It was simply held by the Attorney-General that no officer or private soldier should be detailed, as a barkeeper or otherwise, to sell intoxicating liquors, and that no other person should be required or allowed to sell such liquors. It was, as I have said, to correct any real or supposed defect in language in the act of March 2, 1899, that this amendment passed the House on Thursday, when the Army bill was up for consideration, and which I have already read in your hearing. This is not new. It was before the Fifty-fifth Congress, when a unanimous report was made by the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. It was finally passed as an amendment to the present Army law of March 2, 1899, but rendered inoperative by the opinion of the Attorney-General already referred to. In the Fifty-sixth Congress a similar measure was introduced by Mr. BOWERSOCK, of Kansas, and on the 24th of May the Committee on Military Affairs returned a report, a portion of which I will add hereto, in which they recommended the passage of this bill.

"The bill was referred to the War Department, and a very voluminous report was returned to the committee against the passage of the bill, but the committee believes that, in view of the legislation of the last Congress, when it was intended by Congress to abolish the canteen, but on account of faulty language did not accomplish it, the present bill should pass. The expressions received from all parts of the United States go to the point that even if the canteen results in the decreased consumption of liquor by the Army, the United States Government should not in any sense be connected with the liquor traffic, but let private parties conduct it under the laws of the different States."

I want to get distinctly before you one or two points with reference to our advocacy of the inhibition of liquor selling in the Army.

The advocates of the present canteen system have to some extent, at least, befogged the issue. Our position is rational and common sense, and despite a mass of ex parte testimony for the system is supported both by reason and observation. First, we do not oppose the post-exchange system. We believe in it and are willing to see it extended and improved. We are opposed to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the canteen, and such prohibition need not militate against the successful operation of the post exchange in its other and valuable features. That this is true is apparent from the fact that no class of people have a higher regard for the soldier than the petitioners for this legislation, and I call attention to the fact that our interest is not sordid or commercial; we have no profitable market we are attempting to preserve by stopping governmental liquor selling to the soldiers, as is the case in so many instances on the other side. Also, we indorse the proposition of Sergeant Buzzacott, well known in Army circles the country over, to establish temperance canteens, one of which proved so valuable and profitable in 1898. (See proposition accompanying, marked Exhibit A.)

Second. The Littlefield amendment does not extend to Soldiers' Homes, but only to the military establishment, seeking only what the people intelligently asked for and Congress intended to grant in the act approved March 2, 1899.

Third. The charge that the suppression of liquor selling in the canteen will compel drinking on the outside is answered by the statement, which we can prove beyond a peradventure, that the soldiers—not all, but those who desire to do so—do this now. Experience in many places shows this conclusively, and it is reasonable as well. Cases like Trooper Davis (see Exhibit A) at Fort Myer, almost within the shadow of the War Office, within the year, and the cashiering and dismissal by General Otis of four high officers in the service in the Philippines for drunkenness and unbecoming conduct consequent thereupon, and the condition at the Columbus Barracks, where the aid of the police department of the city was invoked by the commandant to keep the soldiers out of down-town saloons and resorts, and where the records show frequent arrests of soldiers for drunkenness and disorder, either prove that men can and do get drunk on liquors sold in the canteen or else, notwithstanding the canteen, drink outside, or, what is probably true, both. In either of which cases this argument for the canteen is destroyed.

Our contention is that it is quite as important, from every point of view, to provide good environment in the hope of preventing the creation of appetite in abstaining recruits as it is to pander by governmental sanction to the liquor habits of some in the service who still would drink.

Fourth. A second argument for the canteen is, in our judgment, a strong condemnation of the system, namely, that the profits of liquor selling go to improve the mess and hospital service. The Government is amply able to provide for all the needs of the officers and enlisted men, and it should not permit the resort to the menacing inducement to drink by such a system, for few men are liable to share with comfort regularly the profits of a fund they do not help to create. Again, the opponents of the present system are charged with trying to regulate the habits of men in regard to drink, but the canteen defenders are not only guilty of the same charge, but they seek both to prescribe what a man shall drink and where he shall drink it, insisting, if the regulation were carried out, which it is not, that only beer and wines be drunk by the soldier, and then in the canteen. However, this is not an unusual thing in military life. We prescribe what kind of food a soldier shall eat in the Army, and how much of it, and discipline says to him if he grumbles and is recalcitrant because it does not please him, "Go to the guardhouse."

We are not theorists. We do not claim this bill will reform or revolutionize the Army. We believe the trend is in the right direction, and in harmony with General Ludlow's wise suggestions (Major-General Miles's report, 1899, vol. 1, pp. 226-227) when he said: "The weight of authority and precept in this department is on the side of total abstinence. It is believed by this department that prohibition is imperative," and "it is particularly important, where a large proportion of the troops are recruits, that nothing be done officially to create in them the habit of drinking." Seventy-five per cent of our Army are recruits to-day. This suggestion is in line with the successful attempts of the British war department to promote temperance. Wolseley, Roberts, White, Kitchener, Gatacre, Methuen, Kelly-Kenny, and the best leaders in the British service lend their aid in this direction, and the Government encourages the British Army Temperance Association by granting an annual stipend thereto.

The beneficent results are shown in the table, which I give from the records of the British army in India for the year 1898:

	Members Army Temperance Association.	Non-members.
Number soldiers included in return	18,663	48,842
Convictions by court-martial	77	1,777
Convictions by court-martial per 1,000	4.12	36.38
Summary punishments for insubordination	741	4,509
Summary punishments for insubordination per 1,000	39.70	92.32
Admissions to hospital	3,891	14,827
Admissions to hospital per 1,000	209	302

We are not clamoring for or asking impossibilities. We ask the Department to use its influence and its discipline on the right side, and a steady upward trend will result.

There is another misconception I desire to correct. The Army testimony was collected after the will of the Department had been made known in favor of the canteen. Anyone familiar with Army life knows how difficult it is under such circumstances to get an uncolored and unbiased opinion. But notwithstanding the unusual requirement of courage under such conditions, 35 reporting officers declared the canteen to be detrimental to the morality of the men; 40 said it was prejudicial to discipline; 20 say it has increased drunkenness, and 36 declare in favor of its abolition. The high generals, like Miles, Shafter, Wheeler, Ludlow, Wilcox, Robertson, Boynton, Carlin, and others, are on record against it, and the chaplains, those best qualified to speak about the morals of the men, were not invited to express their opinions. The reason is obvious, though a few have volunteered their help in sustaining the Department against the will of the people, though many more, through other channels, have declared against the canteen.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that the constituency which we represent does not malign the soldier. We have the profoundest respect for him and the greatest interest in his welfare. We recognize him as not simply the hireling of the Department, but as typifying the will and might of our people, and we have the right to demand from him the clearest brain, the steadiest nerve, and the best American manhood. If we get these in the Regular—if he keeps in condition to meet emergencies as they arise—it will be well; but if, as many of the officers defending the canteen attempt but fail to have us believe, he will desert if he can't have beer, that he would be low and drunken and unfit for service without the canteen, then we shall needs depend upon the soldier who has never failed us, who always responds in the nation's need and peril, who represents at least the average of our people, the American Volunteer.

The Adjutant-General, in his report for 1899, practically admits the charge of bad results of liquor selling in canteens among Volunteers (p. 39), with an intended inference that it operated well with Regulars in some way or by some means. That the Volunteers do not suffer by comparison, and that some causes were at work to the comparative disadvantage of the Regulars, is evidenced by the following facts taken from tables facing pages 10 and 16 of the Adjutant-General's report just referred to: In round numbers the average monthly strength of Regulars from May 1, 1898, to June 30, 1899, was 56,000; of Volunteers, 112,000—almost 2 to 1.

During that period, among the Regulars, 1 officer and 32 men committed suicide; among twice as many Volunteers, 1 officer and 20 men; 26 Regulars died from murder or homicide; among twice as many Volunteers, 26; 924 Regulars were dishonorably discharged by sentence of general court-martial; among twice as many Volunteers, only 508; 3,036 Regulars deserted out of 56,000—1 out of every 19; 2,736 Volunteers deserted out of 112,000—1 out of every 41.

I shall not take the time of the committee to read the official action of the large and influential church bodies and temperance organizations throughout the country condemning the liquor canteen and urging its prohibition in the establishment, very many of which are on file at our national headquarters in this city. The following are but indicative of similar action by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Evangelical Lutherans, Friends, United Presbyterians, United Brethren, and the other branches of the church. The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church declared in May, 1900:

"We deeply regret that after the enactment of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating beverages at Army posts and in forts, camps, and reservations used for military purposes, a law plainly intended to effectuate this result, and so understood by its friends and foes in and out of Congress and by the Chief Magistrate who signed it, by a construction which seems to us forced and unnatural, placed upon the law by the Attorney-General, its plain intent was defeated, and the Government of the United States, amid the exultation of all sympathizers with the liquor traffic, resumed the practice of selling intoxicating beverages to its soldiers. Aroused and indignant at the aggressiveness of the liquor power, at the inexcusable miscarriage of the anti-canteen law, and at the new perils in which the nation is involved in its new possessions, the church will summon and pledge all her ministers and people to a more determined struggle against this enormous evil and urge each to contribute thereto, according to his judgment, his testimony, his example, and his ballot."

The Columbia Association of Baptist Churches, November 21, 1900, adopted the following resolution against the canteen:

"That this association unites its voice with that which we hear coming up from all parts of the land in earnest protest against the perpetuation of the official saloon for our soldiers, known as the canteen. No amount of testimony is convincing that making it easy to get drink will reduce drunkenness, or that the substitution of beer for the stronger drinks of soldiers who already have formed the drink habit will, for any considerable length of time, compensate for the creation and cultivation of this enslaving appetite in those numerous recruits who are not yet slaves to drink when they enlist."

The great temperance organizations of the country, the Anti-Saloon League, W. C. T. U., Good Templars, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites, Royal Templars, as well as the young people's societies, like the Y. P. S. C. E., Epworth League, B. Y. P. U., and others are petitioners for this legislation by Congress, and, gentlemen, when it is intimated that we must defer to the superior knowledge of men in the service we reply, "Yes, in matters of military tactics and skill and strategy, but not of necessity upon moral propositions." It is not necessary to own a saloon or tend bar to become familiar with the evils of the liquor traffic. It is not necessary to be in the service to learn the evils of the canteen system of to-day.

But we have read the testimony, which was solicited, after the pro-canteen policy of the Department was well known, from certain officers and responded to by about 1,000 (one-half of them noncommissioned, sergeants and corporals) out of over 2,000 in the regular establishment, and over 8,000 in our whole Army at the present time, including the classes of officers to which the inquiries were addressed, and I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that a candid review of the pro-canteen testimony in the Secretary of War's report for 1899 forces the convictions: First, that the testimony is ex parte, many of the officers stating that they have been or are in charge of canteens, and are therefore not likely to testify against the system and, per consequence, themselves. Second, that after the Department had so openly signified its pro-canteen sympathies it would require commendable courage for any considerable number of men in the humbler positions to stand out against it. (This I have from officers of the Army themselves.) Third, many of those testifying for the canteen plainly show by the language employed that they have no sympathy with the temperance side and are opposed, to total abstinence and temperance reform, either in or out of the Army. Many of these sneer at the opponents of the present system as being "meddlers," "long-haired men," "short-haired women," scorn the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other agencies for good, and criticise even the State and local legislation which the sovereign people in these States in their wisdom saw fit to enact. Fourth, that these pro-canteen officers have, in these reports, said more to convict the Army of excessive drinking and drunkenness and lack of self-control than all the temperance people have done or have attempted to do in all the discussion. Fifth, that it would be surprising if our Army should be abstemious when a few of the Department or bureau heads become agitators for the Government saloon, and large numbers of the officers defend liquor drinking and favor liquor selling to the men under governmental auspices. Sixth, that under all these conditions the wonder is we have the magnificent establishment in its personnel that we have to-day. The reason probably lies in the facts behind the statement of Maj. C. A. P. Hatfield, Eighth Cavalry (Secretary of War's Report, p. 127):

"Excellent. [Referring to effect of legislation we seek.] In favor of prohibition. The reforms in morality, temperance, and good behavior which have swept over the United States (particularly the thickly settled Eastern portion) have had a direct and indirect effect for good in the Army. Twenty years ago the average recruit was already a drunkard before joining his company, or with all his inclinations that way; now four out of five recruits are young men brought up in practices of temperance, sobriety, and morality, and with some idea of Christianity. If to take proper care of this good material, develop it, and turn the men out, on discharge, a credit to the Army, to their officers, and to themselves is aided by introducing the recruit to a wine and beer room, where he is taught that it is the proper and loyal thing to patronize the canteen, and beer especially, then my deductions are certainly at fault."

Mr. BUTLER. The part of the statement of the Anti-Saloon League that is not printed in the hearings should come in at this point. I will not ask that it all be read, but that a goodly part of it be read. I am willing that the remainder shall go into the RECORD without reading, but the part which I send to the Secretary's desk I desire to have read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I might interpose something of a protest here. I find that this reverend gentleman puts in words which imply that he was addressing the committee. The committee did not see him at all in that matter and did not hear a word of what has been read. There are some statements there as to which he certainly would have been criticised if he had made them while I was in the chair.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the chairman of the committee that the language he is referring to is a part of the hearings.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a part of the Senator's own report.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a part of the report of the Senator's committee. There has been nothing read so far except what is in the report submitted by him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Besides these facts the testimony is not all on one side, as witness the following, taken from the report of Secretary of War for the year 1899, and in answer to the questions, "What, in your opinion, would be the effect of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army? Are you in favor of such prohibition, or are you in favor of the exchange as conducted at present," etc., these officers said:

Capt. G. H. Paddock, commanding Troop F: "A good effect, especially in this hot climate, where drinking is so injurious. The only excuse, in my opinion, for the canteen was to improve the mess. Now that the ration is good and sufficient, I am in favor of the total prohibition of the sale of intoxicants of all kinds. Have observed for several years the workings of the canteen at several different posts. I have been a successful exchange officer at several posts, as the records will show, and I have done everything in the power of an officer to make the system a success. Yet it is my deliberate opinion that the ease with which intoxicants can be obtained at a post exchange has a tendency to make men, especially young soldiers, drink who would not do so otherwise. In the best-managed exchanges the part where beer is sold is frequented and occupied by the 'old soaks' of the command, whose blear eyes and ribald jests have nothing but an injurious effect upon the decent (always the large) element of a regular command. When no exchange is at a station, none but the worst element of a troop will frequent the public saloons, or, if they do, will do so very seldom, but the exchange saloon, or portion of the exchange where beer is sold, being authorized by law and to that extent made respectable, is more frequented. The argument usually made that men will have their drink is absurd. Our men join us quite young, and if no liquor is in sight they do not think of it. The few old soaks of the Army are of more use in the guardhouse than in line. I do not think that their appetite for liquor should be considered" (p. 120).

Capt. Clarence Deems, commanding Battery C: "Highly beneficial to the health and discipline of the Army. Am in favor of such prohibition" (p. 153).

Capt. Luigi Lomia, commanding Battery H: "I think it would be a good thing. I am in favor of the post exchange with the canteen feature in it eliminated. Billiards, coffee, soda water, ice cream, lunches, etc., might be sold to the men with profit. I have observed the workings of the canteen feature of the exchange more especially since promoted to captain, 1894, February 3. As battery commander I have been informed many times that many of the young men who come into the service would let beer and all other intoxicants alone were it not for the fear of being considered "mean"—that is, the old soldiers in some way or other get the younger soldiers to spend money on them, although "treating" is prohibited. Thus young men acquire the taste for drink that, if the opportunity were not afforded, might never acquire such a taste. In my opinion drink in ninety cases out of one hundred is at the bottom of all a soldier's troubles" (p. 151).

Capt. George E. Sage, commanding Battery E: "Benefit the moral tone of the men and improve the discipline of the service. I am in favor of such prohibition" (p. 153).

Capt. Thomas H. Wilson, commanding Company L: "A very wise proceeding, with beneficial effect. Yes; I am in favor of such prohibition, especially in Cuba. The exchange, so far as I can see, simply affords men a chance to tipple. In this country I think it wise to keep the men from drink as much as possible. The exchange gives them no chance to save money, as the temptation to drink seems very strong here. A well-regulated canteen in the States I consider a necessity. A man who drinks to excess occasionally has, I believe, a much better chance here (Cuba) than the man who takes regular drinks, and this the canteen encourages" (p. 161).

Capt. A. R. Paxton, commanding Company I: "Good, if supplemented by a careful recruiting service" (p. 187).

Lieut. Col. H. W. Wessells, jr., commanding regiment: "It would help the decency of the service. I am unalterably opposed to saloons and saloon keepers. I never can or will believe in saloons or saloon keepers, call them by what euphemistic names you please." (Secretary of War, 1899, p. 112.)

First Lieut. Alonzo Gray, commanding Troop H: "It can not be done except on paper. I am in favor of neither. Stationed ten years where a canteen has been in operation. If the exchange is a cooperative clubhouse for enlisted men, it should be managed by a board composed of enlisted men only, subject to the approval of the commanding officer. Either the canteen is a club or a beer saloon. My position requires me to be a gentleman, and, as such, I object to managing a beer saloon, and do not think any officer ought to be required to do so" (p. 120).

Capt. William Stanton, commanding Troop C: "There would be less drunkenness at the post and, I think, no more in the town or other places near the post. I am in favor of such prohibition. The canteen at the post is a temptation to many who would not take the trouble to go outside the post for a drink. This is especially the case with young men who have not formed the habit of drinking. Even men of intemperate habits might often be prevented from getting drunk if intoxicants were not placed so conveniently within their reach. The plea that you limit the amount of beer sold to a man in the canteen is fallacious. The man who will refuse a man beer when he thinks he has had enough will, I suspect, be hard to find. I believe that the exchange without the canteen can not be maintained, and in consequence the profit now enjoyed by the companies must cease, and it is to this fact I attribute much of the support which the canteen receives from the officers of the Army" (p. 122).

Robert von der Goltz, post quartermaster-sergeant, U. S. A.: "I firmly believe, although not classing myself as a total abstainer and admitting that I indulge occasionally in a glass of beer, but never in liquor, that the absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army would be a benefit to the soldiers and would improve the efficiency of the Army, both from a standpoint of morality and discipline" (p. 210).

Capt. W. H. W. James, commanding Company C: "In my opinion the effect of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army would be a wonderful benefit and advantage to the Army. I am most emphatically in favor of an absolute prohibition of the sale of beer in the Army. I have commanded a company where an exchange was in operation for about three years. In my opinion the way for a man to keep from drinking immoderately is for him not to drink intoxicating liquors at all. By not drinking intoxicating liquors at all a man does not cultivate a taste and liking for intoxicating liquors. If a man drinks at all he is, in my opinion, liable to form a taste and liking for it, the taste and liking for which may be the cause of his ruin. In my opinion, very often the moderate drinker becomes a drunkard. I have seen a statement in print to the following effect: That Sir Garnet Wolseley, the commander in chief of the British army, stated that two young officers of the army starting out, supposing them to be equal in all respects except that one was a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor and the other was a moderate drinker, that the total abstainer had a great advantage over the other officer, a moderate drinker of intoxicating liquors.

"I believe his statement is true, and I believe the same will apply to two soldiers, supposing them to be equal in all respects except that one is a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating drinks and the other a moderate drinker of intoxicating liquor. I believe that the one who is a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor has a wonderful advantage over the one who is a moderate drinker. I believe the argument in favor of the sale of beer in the exchange is that it is the lesser of two evils—that is, that if not sold in the exchange more intoxicating and worse intoxicating liquor would be obtained outside of the post or camp. I say, why take either evil? I am, myself, a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor, except when used as a medicine, which is exceedingly seldom. I believe it is wonderfully better for me to be a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor, except when used as a medicine, and I believe it would be wonderfully better for the enlisted man to be a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor. I believe the sale of beer in the exchange under official sanction is likely to produce the impression in the mind of the soldier that as it is sold with official sanction that it is not so bad after all to drink beer" (p. 201).

Edwin F. Ambrose, commissary-sergeant, U. S. A.: "Would save many young men from acquiring the drink habit. Much of the money now squandered for drink would be saved. General efficiency of the Army would be improved" (p. 233).

Henry Chapman, commissary-sergeant, U. S. A.: "It would remove temptation from the young soldiers, and also from the older men who can not resist the temptation to drink to excess when it can be had so conveniently" (p. 234).

Philip Roth, commissary-sergeant, U. S. A.: "In the main it would have a beneficial effect" (p. 245).

John Noel, ordnance-sergeant, U. S. A.: "In my opinion, the effect would be good" (p. 227).

Charles Cooper Young, hospital steward, United States Army: "An improvement in the morals. In my opinion the sale of intoxicants of any kind in the Army, no matter how restrictive, is not conducive to the health or morals of the soldiers" (p. 273).

Stuart G. Gibbaney, hospital steward, United States Army: "It would result in much improvement in the tone of the Army. The authorizing of the sale of an intoxicant by the Army is looked upon as a licensing of this evil by enlisted men. The absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicants within one or two miles of a post or camp would, in my opinion, result in much benefit to the service, along with strict regulations against inebriety. Less encouragement to post exchanges and more to post libraries would, in my opinion, tend to increase the moral tone and afford a means of counter attraction" (p. 255).

Maj. Charles A. P. Hatfield: "Excellent. In favor of prohibition. The reforms in temperance, morality, and good behavior which have swept over the United States (particularly the thickly settled eastern portion) have had a direct and indirect effect for good in the Army. Twenty years ago the average recruit was already a drunkard before joining his company, or with all his inclinations that way; now four out of five recruits are young men brought up in practices of temperance, sobriety, and morality, and with some idea of Christianity. If to take proper care of this good material, develop it, and turn the men out on discharge a credit to the Army, to their officers, and to themselves is aided by introducing the recruit to a wine and beer room, where he is taught that it is the proper and loyal thing to patronize the canteen, and beer especially, then my deductions are certainly at fault." (Secretary of War's Report, 1899, p. 127.)

Capt. E. H. Catlin, commanding Battery I: "Yes. Good. I have been stationed at posts where canteens existed for ten years. It seems to me contrary to good morals to give official sanction to the sale of alcoholic drinks to soldiers, especially to recruits, some of whom in the canteen acquire the taste for drink that they would not acquire elsewhere. The fact that it is considered inexpedient for soldiers to sell beer is enough to condemn its sale by civilians. To myself personally it is repugnant to have any connection with the management of the beer feature of the exchange, which is catering to men's lower tendencies" (p. 142).

Second Lieut. Edward Kimmel, commanding Battery G: "To a certain considerable extent would lessen the use of the beverage, and to that extent the effect would be beneficial. Am in favor of the prohibition. In my opinion, there is no good to be derived from the use of beer; on the other hand, it has a degrading influence on the soldier, physically, intellectually, and morally. The soldier may obtain beer in some other way, but the Government should not counteract its own efforts toward the making of a good soldier by supplying that which will impair his efficiency" (p. 145).

Edgar C. Graham, post quartermaster-sergeant, U. S. A.: "Benicia Barracks, Cal., June 15, 1899. Organization messes would not live so highly so far as table fare is concerned, but the ordinary enlisted man would be benefited otherwise" (p. 210).

August Kurlmann, post quartermaster-sergeant, U. S. A.: "Fort Mott, N. J. In my opinion the effect would be good" (p. 213).

Samuel A. Trask, post quartermaster-sergeant, U. S. A.: "Pinar del Rio, Cuba, June 17, 1899. Better morals, better discipline, better soldiers. It would take off the so-called respectability. As it is now said, the United States Government fosters the traffic, and thereby a curse to all mankind is made respectable" (p. 216).

R. O. R. Bergath, ordnance sergeant, U. S. A.: "Excellent" (p. 219).

Martin Dahl, ordnance sergeant, U. S. A.: "If the question is meant to imply within the military reservations or camps, I think the effect would be for the better" (p. 221).

Figures are produced to show that desertions have decreased in the Army, but none have shown that the liquor-selling feature of the canteen is responsible for the fact. On the other hand, it is a matter of general knowledge that the character of the recruits has materially improved during the past years. This was mentioned in the first report I read from an officer in your hearing, and Adjutant-General Corbin himself says (1899 Report, p. 40): "For various reasons a better class of men are now entering the service." Besides, it is more difficult each year to desert, because the means of detection and capture are greater. Formerly it was not so hard to escape; now the means of communication make it more difficult. It would be a poor commentary upon our Army if we could believe what the Adjutant-General would have us believe, by implication, at least, that our soldiers' fidelity to duty and the flag is measured by their ability to get "booze" in a canteen. We believe nothing of the sort.

Much stress has been laid upon the law-abiding character of the post-exchange saloons. In many of these places the stronger liquors, forbidden by the regulations, are sold. At Camp Meade, Pa., soldiers were detailed to sell contrary to section 17 of the present law, even as liberally construed by the Attorney-General, as a reference to the canteen case will prove, reported in 22 Penna. C. C. R., 387, June, 1899.

But, while these things are true and the arguments for the present system have been more than answered, even upon the low plane which has been set for them, we plead for a higher standard and an upward trend in our Army life. General Corbin was right when he said in 1892, when he ranked as Assistant Adjutant-General:

"A cause of restlessness (in the Army) is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good, and should be done away with without further experiment. The sale of beer, superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers, is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval. The men who drink spend the greater portion of their money for beer. The credit system brings them to the pay table with little or no money due. This takes all heart out of them and makes them quite ready to ask their discharge and try some other calling. The exchange, with an open saloon, would be a first-rate thing to recommend for adoption in the army of the enemy." He reiterated these sentences by direct reference to two different friends of my own, separately, during the pendency of the Army bill in February, 1899, after nine years' trial of the present system. Why he changed his opinion so suddenly I do not undertake to say.

Before I conclude I want to call attention to a practical difficulty and danger. With the present system there is constant danger of scandal in the service. There is great competition in the brewing trade. Who shall determine what brand shall be sold in a given canteen, and what inducements will not be offered by anxious competitors for coveted trade? This is a serious phase, as it concerns the officer of lower rank, and we can conceive of its reaching to the higher grades in the service, with the temptation, at least.

I desire to say that the statement that the friends of this amendment are hand in glove with the saloon interests is almost beneath notice, but, as it has been made by officers in the reports referred to, and gratuitiously by the Adjutant-General, I wish to say, from personal examination, that the liquor press, from the Washington Sentinel down, and from New York to Cincinnati and Chicago, have opposed and do oppose this amendment, and commend the pro-canteen attitude assumed by the War Department against the people's will.

We ask as fair a trial of no liquor selling in the canteen as the sale has had, with the executive branch, of which the Army is a part, by precept and discipline aiding in the enforcement of its spirit and letter. Our position is well stated in the House Report by the Committee on Military Affairs referred to and the following editorial in Harper's Bazaar, June 9, 1900:

"At present 85 per cent of the United States Army is in the Tropics. Moreover, this is the keynote of the whole question, as General Ludlow puts it: 'It is particularly important, where a large proportion of the troops are recruits, that nothing be officially done to create in them the habit of using intoxicants.' Recruits form 75 per cent of the strength of the Army. These men have left home, family, business, all minor duties, to serve their country in time of war. Shall this country repay them by officially establishing in their midst a temptation threatening them, and the loved ones to whom they will return, with the horror of the vice of drinking?

"If, as General Corbin says, these men, in the absence of post canteens, drink native liquors in the Tropics worse in effect than the beer or light wine the canteen would furnish, it is deplorable—a hideous individual sacrifice in the cause of civilization which the United States has undertaken in the Philippine Islands. But for such consequences of individual human frailty, amid surroundings tempting to vice, the Government is not officially responsible. It doubtless is morally responsible so long as it sustains war in the Philippines, but the volunteer who, having served his country three years in the Tropics and come home diseased, debauched by drink, can not accuse anyone but himself if he sought his doom outside the post to which the Government assigned him. If, however, by official act the Government tempted him to drink, he shall say in bitterness of heart which is a curse upon patriotism, 'I answered the call of my country at the risk of all my earthly interests and it called me to this—dishonor, depravity.'

"To abolish the canteen will not regenerate the Army. But the words of General Ludlow should be the text for Congressional action: 'Nothing should be done officially to create in volunteer troops the habit of using intoxicants.'" (Major-General Miles's Report, 1899, vol. 2, pp. 226, 227.)

By the committee's courtesy I shall append to my statement a number of exhibits on various features of the discussion without comment.

I assure the committee that the friends of this amendment will be glad to assist in every practicable way to provide for the men in our military service. None helped in many ways more heartily and loyally during the late war than many who join us in this petition to you, and I may be pardoned if I say I am specially hopeful that you will recommend the adoption of section 40 as it has come from the House, and then that the Department will accept Mr. Buzzacot's generous and patriotic and practical offer (see Exhibit A). Give what we ask a fair chance, and we believe much good will result and the blessings of thousands of our people who break up homes and part with loved ones at the nation's call will be upon you.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is a gentleman present, at the request of the Secretary of War, who desires to represent the defenders of the present system, and I have no desire to run over the present time. If you will permit me to file with the committee, for, I trust, their careful consideration, a proposition from Francis H. Buzzacot, of Chicago, I will simply call attention to that now. This is a proposition which has been on file for months past in the War Department, thus far without definite answer. Mr. Buzzacot is a man who has conducted temperance canteens, which have been expatiated upon in the reports of the Department, and which canteen during the Cuban war netted a profit to the regiment of $5,000. He offers to do the same thing at a good point in the Philippines and carry it on from place to place if the Government will give him the opportunity to do so, and without the Government expending any money in its initiation. It is a marvelous proposition, gentlemen, and I wish to call your attention to it in the course of the papers which I shall file, with the courtesy of the committee, with the stenographer, in order to reach you more fully, so that you may give it your attention.

Mr. SEWELL. Where does that letter or article come from? From whom is it?

Mr. BUTLER. It is from the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BUTLER. The distinguished Senator certainly knows of such an organization.

Mr. SEWELL. But will the Senator now let us have a vote on this question?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that, but I am not quite through.

Mr. SEWELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will wait a moment.

Mr. SEWELL. It is not so important about the canteen as to get to the passage of the bill at some reasonable time.

Mr. BUTLER. I judged from the committee's report that the canteen was the only important part of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Ah, the Senator is inclined to be a little sarcastic.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator can not read.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator can, but he can not read like the Attorney-General can. Has the Secretary read down to Exhibit A? Is that the next matter sent up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Secretary has read to that point.

Mr. BUTLER. There are certain exhibits composing the remainder of this matter, and I will ask that they may be inserted in the RECORD, following what the Secretary has read.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 20, 1899.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.
(Through the Adjutant-General United States Army, Washington, D. C.)

SIR: I have the honor to respectfully tender my services and such an amount as is necessary, not to exceed $5,000, to be expended by me or under my direction for the purpose of erecting and establishing a model Army temperance canteen to be conducted under military regulations for the recreation, benefit, and modern advantages of such United States volunteer troops as are now serving in the Philippines.

In this temperance canteen there will be sold on a scale lower than prevailing market prices all such articles and comforts that troops in tropical camps require—to supply many of such articles as books, literature, games, all free of cost (in short, to provide anything that is right and proper), except liquor or intoxicants; absolutely nothing of this nature to be permitted or disposed of in its vicinity.

This temperance canteen will be capable of accommodating 1,000 men under its portable canvas roof. It will be floored, ventilated, and equipped with a general store for the disbursement of such goods as are approved of by the War Department. It will be provided with reading and writing tables, recreation tables, benches, music, pictorial magazines, and will be absolutely free to our soldier boys for their comfort, entertainment, and accommodation, at such times as they have for recreation when off duty. Neat and tasty lunch counters will be erected and maintained for the serving of hot tea, coffee, chocolate, fresh milk, iced tea, lemonade, and such drinks as will be beneficial to troops instead of hurtful to them. The serving of light lunches will be encouraged, of a nature to relieve the monotonous effect of the Army ration.

Athletic games will be furnished, baseball and football outfits provided and loaned to the troops on all proper occasions, when time permits, and thus supplied to the men free.

In this temperance canteen and its establishment and equipment I proffer my services until its erection and complete organization, whereupon I shall make full and complete presentation of same to the Government, through such commanding officers as the honorable Secretary of War directs, absolutely free of debt or any expense whatever to the Government or troops, asking only that upon its successful existence the United States Government will so maintain it, as a strictly temperance canteen, wherever it can be of service to bodies of troops who remain in the camp or field.

It is to be understood also that all profits arising from the sale of everything will be strictly accounted for (less a reasonable percentage for running expenses), and the entire balance to be used for the purpose of issues to the troops or commands who patronize this canteen, in such a way as will relieve the monotony of camp fare and rations, and best add to the comfort, benefit, health, and moral advancement of the troops abroad. Lastly, that a small percentage be set aside for the sole purpose of extending the movement and establishing other temperance canteens elsewhere, thus letting the good work go on.

Religious or song services could also be held here, and what more fitting place could be found for a regiment and its music than a temperance canteen in the midst of a camp of our soldier boys?

It is to be hoped that the Secretary of War will, with other departments, look well into this offer. There should be unison in one fair effort to establish a model Army temperance canteen, which would be a source of comfort and convenience to the boys, and a credit to those who indorse such a movement.

Surely it will be appreciated by the men, for is not it a twofold benefit and a credit to them? In conclusion, I beg in support of my offer to state that an experience of over ten years in the Regular and Volunteer Armies (both in peace and war) acquaints me with the actual requirements of soldiers in the field, and I trust will, in a small measure, contribute to the success of the temperance canteen. For your information I may add that during the Spanish-American war I presented to my regiment, the Third Illinois Infantry, a complete temperance canteen on the lines herein indicated, and the records will show that in several months' existence it grew to be the largest temperance canteen ever established, capable of accommodating an entire regiment and band for church service. Its profits cleared its original cost, and amounted in all to $5,000 (in but a few months' time), all of which was turned over to my regiment, distributed, and used by its various companies during its campaign in the Tropics.

At this camp 20,000 troopers visited and patronized it. I refer with pride to these facts simply to indicate what can be done by a soldier alone. With its recognition and cooperation by the Secretary of War and other departments I will strive to repeat and extend its influences with a credit to every man and soldier concerned, and I will cheerfully pay every dollar necessary for its establishment.

I believe such a movement will be indorsed by every Christian or temperance association in the United States. Mothers, sisters, and men have long since urged reform in Army canteens.

There is a way to do away with the beer canteen; put in its place something better, something so vastly superior and elevating that will make American soldier boys proud of their own institution. Let there be a respectable, honorable, temperance canteen and it will reflect both on the service and men, and honor those who sanction and aid the movement. I feel, sir, that I have said enough; what is most needed is to go to work.

I respectfully urge the indorsement of this offer by the honorable Secretary of War, the generals commanding the various departments, and whosoever is for a model Army temperance canteen. If this offer is accepted, I will personally establish it at any point in the Philippines where a large body of troops is stationed. Then let the results accomplished speak for themselves.

I have the honor to be, with great respect.

FRANCIS H. BUZZACOT,
Late Fifth U. S. Cavalry, late Fifteenth U. S. Infantry, Sergeant, U. S. Volunteer Infantry, Porto Rico Campaign.

SOLDIER CRAZED BY DRINK—HOLDS FORT MYER GARRISON AT BAY FOR SEVERAL HOURS.

Nicholas Davis, a member of Troop B, Third United States Cavalry, created considerable excitement Thursday afternoon at Fort Myer, and for several hours held the entire garrison at bay. Davis is said to have been drinking to excess the fore part of the week, and the effect of the liquor was to lead him to the belief that the fort was being stormed by an enemy and it was his duty to defend it. Every man who appeared in sight was made a target by the infuriated man, and in order to prevent any accidents all of the roads leading through the reservation were guarded.

Davis entered the troop quarters, and with a Krag-Jörgensen rifle kept a watch on all sides. There was plenty of ammunition at hand for him and he was free in his shots. The fortifications were almost impregnable against attack except with danger of loss of life attending the capture. All efforts to entice him out were unavailing, and he held the fort in spite of the various subterfuges employed in the endeavor to get him to surrender. The soldiers of the garrison, acting upon orders from Captain Broughton, commanding Troop B, attempted to smoke him out, but this plan failed.

Several soldiers who were well acquainted with Davis, including his "bunkie," started to walk up the stairs to the place where he was holding forth, but he refused to recognize them and menacingly thrust the muzzle of his rifle in their direction, causing a general scamper to cover. Captain Broughton himself attempted to conciliate him, but he could do nothing. After all endeavors to dislodge him from his position, and the waste of several hours of time, it is said, it was decided to shoot him. The sergeant of the guard was instructed to secure a detail for this purpose. The guard secured a point of vantage and waited for Davis to appear at one of the windows of the company house. He was very shrewd, and only showed the top of his head when taking aim. A chance was finally offered, and two soldiers fired at him. He was seen to disappear, and for the time it was thought he had been shot through the head. Some of the men started up the stairs after him, when they were alarmed by his heavy footsteps as he paced the floor above.

Captain Broughton finally entered the room and fearlessly ordered Davis to come downstairs and receive attention from the doctor. Edging his way, he finally managed to grasp the rifle, and in a short time Davis was subdued. He had not been struck when fired upon. The bullet, however, struck the stock of his rifle and splintered it, some of the flying particles of wood being embedded in his face. It required the combined efforts of four men to take him to the hospital. It is possible he will be sent to the Government Hospital for the Insane if his condition does not improve.

CANTEEN'S WORK.

The suicide of poor Harry McDowell, of Company M, took place last December. Repeated attempts have been made to conceal the real facts. A stigma was put upon the memory of this man to which he was not entitled. McDowell had been out of the hospital only two days. He was homesick; he got drunk on liquor bought in the regimental saloon on credit, and had not the canteen records been burned they would prove it. He was thrown into the guardhouse. This consisted of two rooms aggregating 16 by 32 feet in size, with a low ceiling, and situated on the ground floor—a part of a Manila house that no Filipino will sleep in because of the deadly fevers.

This guardhouse had one small window and one door, which was kept closed by McCoy's (McCoy was colonel of the regiment) express orders. The thermometer was then nearly 100 degrees in the shade every day, and the days and nights were rendered terrible by the odors and mosquitoes in the prison. There were 23 men there the day McDowell died. He had passed a sleepless night; he was in the condition any man just from the hospital and sick from intoxication would be in, and he reported to Major Kemble for relief. Because McDowell took no bottle to the dispensary he got no medicine. He returned to the guardhouse. The door still being shut, he tried to get relief by using a small fan. About noon he remarked, "I can't stand this any longer," and, taking a knife from his haversack, cut his throat. After this the guardhouse door was kept open. There is blood on the canteen profits and its promoters.

[Habana Post, July 6, 1900.]

A DISGRACED OCCASION.

It was a source of genuine disappointment to the large assemblage of American citizens who gathered to witness the Vedado field sports of the soldiers belonging to the batteries stationed there that a feature not down on the programme, but made one of the most notable of the day, should have been brought prominently to their attention. The permitting of the Army canteen on the ground to the right and in front of the grand stand gave the visitors, American and Cuban, an enforced opportunity of witnessing the disgraceful spectacle of perhaps a hundred drunken soldiers, many of whom were violently disorderly, even to engaging in fist fights and general brawls, in the presence and ostensibly under the supervision of the officers of the batteries. It is doubtful if such a disgusting and disgraceful spectacle has ever before been offered the people of Cuba upon the occasion of a public celebration. Certainly not within the experience of a large proportion of the civilian visitors who went to the exercises, expecting to see high-class sports, conducted in an orderly and truly American manner, has there ever been witnessed such scenes of drunkenness, disorderliness, and general confusion.

The Fourth of July was disgraced by the debauchery which prevailed, but it was even worse prostituted by officers who gave their consent to the establishing of a drinking tent in a place of public amusement to which the public had been invited and whose money was taken for what was supposed to be a respectably conducted exercise. So noticeable was the debauchery for a time that some one in authority actually closed the place for at least two hours, giving the boys this much time in which to sober up, but it was reopened at 1 o'clock, and from that hour until the exercises were over was the rendezvous for all the Army toughs the batteries and visiting companies contain; fight after fight following as men lost their heads under the influence of liquor in the rays of a broiling tropical sun. It was a repulsive sight for the ladies, hundreds of whom were forced to view it from their grandstand seats, and equally disgusting to the sterner sex, who love their natal day and would have been glad to have seen it observed in decency and order.

Some one is to blame for the disgrace which was brought to the United States and its flag Wednesday. How can we consistently censure ill-tempered Spaniards and Cubans for displaying it upside down when we admit to our public places of amusement disorderly conducted canteens to turn our soldiers upside down, make them lose their self-control, and indulge in rowdyism that belonged to the Bowery of other days. The canteen did not locate itself in a conspicuous part of the grounds, nor did it license itself to sell liquor to soldiers in all stages of intoxication. If it was thought necessary for the pleasure of the boys in blue that they should have their beer upon such an occasion the canteen should have at least been put under guard and at the worst have been conducted decently. Furthermore, it should have been located where visitors would not have been made to see its rowdyism and debauchery. Every self-respecting American must have felt like hiding his head in shame over the disgusting exhibition given him at the Vedado field sports on Wednesday. Small wonder is it that the Cuban ladies who were present, to whom such scenes are altogether unknown, should have shown the revulsion of feeling that many of them manifested, and small wonder it is that American ladies in the grand stand blushed with mortification at the indecencies of the day. The Fourth of July was sorely disgraced in our own house.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, December 7, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I was in and around St. Paul and Minneapolis great part of May, June, and July, 1898, and also during the month of April, 1899, engaged in temperance work. I was frequently at Fort Snelling and the Soldiers' Home, being a civil war veteran myself, and interested in these localities for historic reasons, as well as for purposes related to my work. I made a careful study of the canteen in Fort Snelling as to whether it kept soldiers from going outside for intoxicating drink. I was unable to see that it had any appreciable good effect in this regard. Soldiers came and went freely to the saloons a couple of hundred yards away at the end of the high bridge across the Mississippi. I saw dozens of them in the barroom of the restaurant and hotel where I lodged, at the end of the bridge, and other throngs were coming and going all the time to and from another saloon just across the street.

The trade in the saloons at the end of the bridge was enormous, the beer kegs being stacked in the streets in great ricks, the patronage being almost exclusively that from Fort Snelling. I saw the soldiers in Mendota at the saloons there. I saw them in large numbers in the saloons of Minnehaha Park Station, near, and in the saloons of Minneapolis and St. Paul, to which there is access in a few minutes by street railway from Fort Snelling.

The situation, in short, was that if a soldier did not get all the beer he wanted in Fort Snelling he went outside a little way and easily procured all he desired, while many who did not care enough for it to go outside, yet drank from the canteen in the fort because it was handy.

The Fort Snelling canteen seemed to me only one more opportunity to drink, and one more source of temptation, of which there were already too many in the region.

Very respectfully,

J. C. JACKSON,
Editor American Issue.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

EXHIBIT F.

[From the Philadelphia Record.]

FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF SECRETARY ROOT.

Secretary Root's annual report of the business of the War Department reopens the vexed question as to the advisability of maintaining post exchanges. The Secretary, who defends Army canteens, says:

"The practical question to be considered is not whether soldiers should drink or not drink, but whether they should be permitted to drink beer in the camp, surrounded by the restraining influences of discipline and good association, or whether they should be driven to drink bad whisky in the vile resorts which cluster around the limits of every military post and camp, and especially around those in which prohibition is maintained."

Many people had cherished the belief that the post exchange would tend to repress the annoying exuberance of soldiers who indulge in intoxicants; but the experience of residents in the vicinity of Camp Meade, when 30,000 Spanish war volunteers were mobilized there, convinced them of their mistake. While the canteen was in daily operation Harrisburg and the neighboring towns were overrun by drinking soldiers, and the speak-easies in the vicinity found patrons by the hundred.

EXHIBIT G.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, December 3, 1900.

MY DEAR MR. DINWIDDIE: In reference to the subject of the canteen at Fort Thomas, Ky. (just across from Cincinnati), you can say that while the canteen in the camp is in operation there has grown up at the entrance a row of saloons which have no local patronage except from the soldiers.

The sight of soldiers about the saloons of this city is common, and on some occasions that I have known of at the time their conduct on the cars going back has been offensive, to say the least.

Very truly, yours,

MELVILLE RITCHIE,
420 Elm street.

[Cleveland Plain Dealer, December —, 1900.]

REV. E. G. SAUNDERSON OBJECTS TO ARCHBISHOP IRELAND'S ATTITUDE ON CANTEEN.

Rev. E. G. Saunderson, formerly of St. Paul and Minneapolis, is in Cleveland, and yesterday his attention was called to the statement made by Archbishop Ireland, of St. Paul, concerning the canteen. He made the following statement concerning it in reply to what Archbishop Ireland has said:

"My attention has been called to the report from Washington that Archbishop Ireland has spoken in favor of the Army canteen before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and referring to observations at Fort Snelling. Knowing the Archbishop to be an ardent temperance man, I am sure he would not advocate a course he believed would conduce to evil. The chaplain at Fort Snelling is one of the Archbishop's priests, and no doubt his efforts have been steady and strong for the good of the men under his care.

"Fort Snelling is just outside the corporate limits of St. Paul, but the part of the city now in the Eleventh Ward is prohibition territory by charter, having been in the old city of Hamline, since united with St. Paul. But this fact, added to the presence of beer in the canteen on the reservation, does not prevent the existence of resorts of the worst sort just off the reservation. Neither does the canteen prevent soldiers from coming down town and patronising the saloons and other places of evil resort.

"Fort Snelling would seem an ideal place to prove the efficiency of the canteen system, as the Soldiers' Club has a beautiful situation, pleasant surroundings of fine barrack and shade, well conducted school, faithful chaplain interested in the good of his men, and all this surrounded by a belt of prohibition territory. It ought to be easy to keep within the guard lines all not strong enough to go down town and come back sober. But, as a matter of personal observation, soldiers, as soon as relieved from duty, in large numbers hurry past the canteen to the street cars, and spend their evenings down town as they choose.

"The condition of Fort Snelling, to my mind, proves nothing for or against the canteen, except as it is easy to get beer there any time, while beer and worse are to be had clandestinely across the bridge, and anything St. Paul offers at the end of thirty minutes ride down town. The principal argument for the canteen, that the soldiers will stay away from more dangerous drinks and resorts if afforded beer in the canteen, is not more true of soldiers than of other men. No one advocates wine and beer shops in residence districts of cities to aid in keeping young men from going down town nights.

"The only possible argument for the canteen is that it is a concession to the habits of the men which may be made without danger to discipline or efficiency. Discipline should keep the soldier from any danger outside. If experience proves that such of the soldiers as bring with them into the service a thirst for beer, may have that thirst supplied, the Government may assume to permit them to obtain beer through military channels. But it should not be done by the canteen as now conducted, when every man who enjoys the financial advantages of the profits of the canteen feels in honor bound to contribute to the profits by paying for beer.

"Efficiency is the first thing in the Army. In view of the recent testimony from prominent officers as to the effects of strong drink on the soldier in the field, it would be well for the United States authorities to put a premium on sobriety and encourage the enlistment of men who do not bring with them a love of drink, and deliver them from the dangers of drink in the soldier's club, the canteen.

"In the interests of efficiency the Army Regulations prescribe what a soldier shall wear, what he shall eat, and where he shall eat it. Everything must bend to efficiency. No one claims beer is essential to efficiency. All that anyone claims is that it may be permitted to a degree without serious danger to efficiency. But the overwhelming weight of testimony is that it is always a menace to efficiency, and in some cases a positive hindrance.

"The canteen system is principally under the charge of regimental officers. If any such officers are themselves fond of beer, and if brewers think it worth while to subsidize them with free cases, the reason for some favorites for the saloon may be discerned. The Regular Army ought not to be the last resort for bums and toughs and loafers. It ought to be as honorable a calling as any in the country. Archbishop Ireland proclaims himself an abstainer. If total abstinence is good for the Archbishop, it is also good for the soldier."

TAFT COMMISSION DIVIDED—MANILA LIQUOR LAW THE SUBJECT OF SHARP CONTROVERSY.

MANILA, December 14.

The liquor-license law has passed the Taft Commission, but the commission is radically divided on its most distinctive feature, namely, the banishment of saloons from the Escolta and several other crowded streets and plazas. Commissioner Wright offered an amendment leaving the authority for the removal of saloons in the districts in question to the provost marshal. The amendment received only the votes of Commissioners Wright and Ide. An amendment by Judge Taft excepting certain streets and adding others was adopted, Commissioners Wright and Ide voting in the negative. On the passage of the bill Commissioner Ide voted "no" and Commissioner Wright voted with the majority. If there had been a seconder, Commissioner Wright would have offered an amendment forbidding the sale of liquor to soldiers.

An amendment was added extending the time for the removal of saloons from three to six months, namely, on July 2. One of the sections, increasing the cost of licenses, goes into effect January 1, when the licenses expire.

During the arguments of Commissioners Wright, Ide, Worcester, and Taft in favor of closing the saloons they cited the liquor laws of Tennessee and Massachusetts as effective precedents for confining the sale of liquor to prescribed localities. They also said the native police are ineffective to cope with the situation when soldiers visit Manila and become hilarious.

Heavy rain has fallen for several days. This deters war operations, especially on the part of the cavalry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the roll call 55 Senators have responded. There is a quorum present. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to an amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, section 34, line 4, strike out the word "beer," and in line 5, strike out the words "intoxicating liquors" and insert in lieu thereof "distilled spirits;" so as to read:

SEC. 34. The sale of or dealing in wine or any distilled spirits by any person in any post exchange or canteen or army transport or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States, is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to lay the proposed amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to lay the committee amendment on the table.

Mr. BACON. The committee amendment, Mr. President?

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. What effect would that have on the House section? Will it leave it in force?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would leave it in force.

Mr. SEWELL. I think the Senator had better allow us to have a direct vote on the committee amendment. I ask him to withdraw his motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we can get a direct vote, and we get the affirmative of it. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to lay on the table the amendment of the committee which has been stated.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. SEWELL demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SEWELL. Let us have a fair vote.

Mr. CLARK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS]. Not seeing him in the Chamber and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TURLEY. I was authorized by the Senator from Kansas to state that on this question he would vote in favor of the committee amendment, if he were present.

Mr. CLARK. With that understanding, and upon the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. FORAKER'S name was called). The Senator from Ohio is absent, and is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. The Senator from Ohio would vote "yea" if here.

Mr. CARTER (after having voted in the negative). Since voting I have been requested by the Senator from New Hampshire to stand paired with the absent Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and in view of his request, to which I accede, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. He not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TURLEY (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). I repeat the statement that I was authorized by the Senator from Kansas to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL (when Mr. KEAN'S name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). On this subject I am paired with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MASON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. He is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. I have telegraphed him to know how he stands, but can not get a delivery of the message. Therefore I can not vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], who is absent. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I will refrain from voting. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington (Mr. TURNER).

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MALLORY. I have been informed that the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired on this question with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. That leaves me at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. QUARLES] is detained from the Chamber to-day by sickness.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am authorized to state that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER], who is absent from the city, is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with that Senator, and under the circumstances am compelled to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 15; as follows:

So the committee amendment was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further committee amendments?

Mr. PROCTOR. On behalf of the committee I submitted an amendment to section 24, which is in the hands of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 16, strike out all of section 24 after the words "Military Academy" and insert the following:

Persons not over 40 years of age who have served as volunteers subsequent to April 21, 1898, may be ordered before boards of officers for such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and who may establish their fitness before these examining boards, may be appointed to the grades of first or second lieutenant in the Regular Army, taking rank in the respective grades according to seniority as determined by length of prior commissioned service; but no officer appointed under the provisions of this section shall be placed above another in the same grade with longer commissioned service, and nothing herein contained shall change the relative rank of officers heretofore commissioned in the Regular Army.

Enlisted men of volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants in the Regular Army under the same conditions now authorized by law for enlisted men of the Regular Army.

Mr. HOAR. I am not familiar with the legislation on this subject, but does the clause—

But no officer appointed under the provisions of this section shall be placed above another in the same grade with longer commissioned service—deprive the President of any general discretion?

Mr. BACON. Senators are standing so close to each other that they do not raise their voices so that those who sit on this side can hear them.

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Georgia is not heard on this side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. PROCTOR. The amendment is printed, and was distributed yesterday. It does not affect in the slightest degree the discretion of the President. In answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that it merely preserves the present relative rank of officers now in the Army. The amendment, I may state, changes the original measure in this respect: The first word in line 16, page 36, is "officers." That is changed to "persons," so that it opens the door to anyone who has served in the volunteers since April 21, 1898, the outbreak of the Spanish war. It allows them to be ordered by designation of the President, of course, before boards for examination, and to be appointed first and second lieutenants. The last clause in the amendment in reference to enlisted men reads as follows:

Enlisted men of volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants in the Regular Army under the same conditions now authorized by law for enlisted men of the Regular Army.

It gives enlisted men this additional opportunity. The first part of the section would only allow those enlisted men of volunteers who were designated for examination by the President to be appointed. This second clause gives the right; and this I call to the attention of the senior Senator from Iowa especially, because I noticed he was under a misapprehension the other day. The original law in regard to promoting enlisted men of the Regular Army to second lieutenants was confined to noncommissioned officers, who were designated by their captains and recommended. By an additional law, passed I think in 1892, the right was given to any enlisted man on his own motion, without the recommendation of the captain, to come before those boards for examination, and this final clause gives enlisted men of volunteers that same right after two years' service either in the volunteers or in the Regular Army. That right has been extended already by the Department this summer. In the case of those who have served for two years, their volunteer service has been counted, and 65 have been appointed under this clause. That opens it to volunteers to come in for examination on their own motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. Proctor.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to make an inquiry. I observe in the concluding part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont it is stated that—

Enlisted men of volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants in the Regular Army under the same conditions now authorized by law for enlisted men of the Regular Army.

As I understand it, an enlisted man in the Regular Army is required to serve two years before he can ask for an examination by a board. If this is a mere extension of that privilege to Volunteers, the great mass of volunteers who served in the Spanish war would not be included in it at all. I ask the Senator if that is his understanding of the amendment?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Virginia will notice that the first part of the section gives enlisted men, by designation of the President, the right to appointment as first or second lieutenants, regardless of the time they have served. It would be impracticable, the Senator will see, to give the right to all who have served as enlisted men in any of our wars, for no matter how short a time, to come before these boards, for the number would be so very great that it would be impossible to execute the law. But it gives the right to those who are designated for examination to come before the board without reference to the time they have served. Any who have served in the Volunteer Army, officers or enlisted men, since the outbreak of the Spanish war can be designated for examination before the board.

I wish before taking my seat to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to this provision, as he had some point to make upon it when it was introduced.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think the amendment as it is now framed carries out the provisions that ought to be provided in this law, according to my notion. Volunteers, whether they were commissioned officers or not, who have served in the Army since the commencement of the Spanish war can, under the first paragraph of the provision, be examined and, if they pass, they may be appointed first or second lieutenants in the Army.

The last part of the provision, and that is entirely independent of the other and supplemental to it, provides that a Volunteer enlisted man can come in and be examined as enlisted men are examined for second lieutenants in the Regular Army, and I understand that their service of two years in the Volunteer Army will be credited to them in like manner as though they had served two years in the Regular Army. I believe that is the understanding and that that is the rule.

The provision, so far as it relates to volunteers, is of a double kind. They can come in under the first paragraph and be examined under that, and be a first or second lieutenant; or they can come in under the last paragraph and be examined, and become second lieutenants.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator who has this matter in charge what is the object of putting it in the past tense—

Persons not over 40 years of age who have served.

It seems to me that might admit of a construction that it does not apply to future volunteers. I wish the Senator would allow me to move to amend it by inserting after the word "served" the words "or shall hereafter serve."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. How would it then read?

Mr. TELLER. "Who have served or shall hereafter serve." I understand it is intended to take in some who are out of the service now. A man who is serving has served, of course, but any man who has served heretofore and gone out of the service could not under this provision be eligible, as I understand it. What I want to secure is that the volunteer in the future shall have an opportunity of preferment.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator if he puts the word "shall" before the word "have," that will apply to the time of examination. If his amendment is adopted, then a man who to-day has served eight months would be included, because he has served heretofore, and he will not have served hereafter for two years.

Mr. TELLER. I think that will hardly hold good. What I want to do is to get this provision in such a shape that in the future the young man who enters the Army of the United States will know that he has an opportunity, if he distinguishes himself, to be promoted to an office in the Regular Army. I think if this great Army is to be recruited you have got to offer some inducement to the people of the United States to enter the Army. I am told on what I regard as good authority that the enlistments, with all the effort the Government can make, are so very small that it would take a long time to fill up the Army. I believe, and I think I am not mistaken, that last month's enlistments, with the inducements which have been made heretofore, were only about 1,600. At that rate it will take a long time to fill up the Army so as to have men to take the place of those who are to be discharged on the 1st of July.

I want to get the provision in such a shape that it will be unmistakable that every young man who goes into the volunteer force will understand that every place in the Army is open to him, first by appointment, and subsequently by promotion. Now, I do not care just how that is done. I am willing that the Senator who has it in charge shall make the change.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him and to call attention to the last three lines on page 2? I think that is a continuing provision and will apply in the future as well as in the past.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make dead sure of this provision. We have had some trouble with the construction of statutes in the Departments.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; if the Senator wants to tell how he can accomplish this end, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. PROCTOR. It is not thought necessary to insert anything of that kind for the reason that the army provided for by this measure takes the place of volunteers, and the provision in regard to the Regular Army is one that has stood. It was adopted many years ago. It was largely liberalized about seven or eight years ago, so that any man in the Regular Army, after two years' service, might of his own motion go before the board of examination. That is continued, and his volunteer service will be counted.

I would say that after the Spanish war there were quite a good many volunteers who wanted to know whether if they went into the Regular Army their service as volunteers would be counted on the two years, and they were assured that it would be done. That system has been adopted, and some of them have been appointed as second lieutenants. That provision is continued.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont, so that I may understand this matter, whether the first portion of the amendment, namely, "persons not over 40 years of age who have served as volunteers subsequent to April 21, 1898, may be ordered before boards of officers" for examination, and on establishing their fitness "may be appointed to the grade of first or second lieutenant in the Regular Army," will allow a person who served as a private in the Volunteer Army to be designated for examination, although he did not serve two years.

Mr. PROCTOR. It does not matter how short the time he served.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then I think that is wrong. A private enlisted in the Regular Army can only be designated for examination, as I understand it, after he shall have served two years. I do not think there ought to be such a discrimination as that made in favor of a volunteer. I think that he should be put on the same basis with a person who has served as a private in the Regular Army, but to say that a volunteer who served thirty days in the Spanish war as a private may be examined and appointed a first or second lieutenant when the man who has served a year and eleven months in the Regular Army as a private can not be, I think is an improper discrimination.

Mr. DANIEL. As I understand it, the President can appoint from the Regular Army if he chooses to do so.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will say in reply to the Senator from Connecticut that they are not put on the same footing. Volunteers who have served a short time may be designated by the President for examination. Those who have served two years may of their own motion as a right go before the board. It is not required that they shall be recommended by their commanding officers or be designated by the President or Secretary of War; they have that right.

Mr. TELLER. I still insist that there should be some amendment.

Persons not over 40 years of age who have served.

Now, that means who have served up to this time. We are enlisting men every day now, I understand, who will serve as volunteers under the act of 1899.

Mr. PROCTOR. No.

Mr. TELLER. I have been told so. There is the authority to enlist, and whether that is done or not I do not know. But certainly there is an authority to enlist, and it surely can not embarrass the bill to put in words so as to make it certain that if there is any soldier serving between this and the 1st of July he can come in.

But, Mr. President, in addition to that, this is a general Army bill. If we should have occasion to muster a great big army, which we may have if the suggestion from the chairman the other day was true that there were some possibilities of a foreign war, for I notice that he said something that is being construed into that by the newspapers——

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to correct the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I noticed that the newspapers said that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I said in the most general way that we are not out of sight of the possibilities of war.

Mr. TELLER. With some European power?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not think I said European power.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, you did. I have got it right here. This is the RECORD. This is what the Senator said, if the RECORD is correct, and that is my memory, too. But it is not a material point. It does not make any particular difference whether there is a possibility of war. The Senator was not refering to the Philippine war, of course. He said:

We are not altogether out of sight of some possibility of war yet with some European power. We do not know. They are in a great deal of trouble there, and I understand they look with very great jealousy upon our talk of a Danish island and our talk about acquiring other territory.

Now, the newspapers are insisting that the Senator from Connecticut has some knowledge about foreign affairs which is withheld from the rest of us, and that we are in great danger of having a foreign war. I do not think the Senator intended to convey any such impression.

Mr. HAWLEY. The newspaper man who wrote that was under the necessity of making it as interesting as he could.

Mr. TELLER. I am going to make a motion to amend the amendment. After the word "served," in line 3, I move to insert "or shall hereafter serve."

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to interrupt him a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. TELLER. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection whatever to modifying the amendment so that it shall apply to anyone who enlists in the Volunteer Army between now and the 30th of June, when the Volunteer Army goes out of existence. I do not understand that any men are being or will be enlisted. It would be a very unwise policy. Enlistments are going on, but I understand they are recruits for the Regular Army. I do not think it would be wise to put in a provision that this shall apply to volunteers who may be hereafter authorized. That could be done when there is any legislation authorizing the raising of volunteers. They might be raised for thirty days or three months, and Senators can see that it would be unjust in such a case to have a general law on the statute book that any volunteer hereafter, no matter how short his services, shall be entitled to an examination for promotion.

Mr. TELLER. This provision is that he may be ordered. By whom? By the President. Of course it is not on his motion that he goes. I move to insert, after the word "served," the words "or shall hereafter serve."

Mr. PROCTOR. Previous to June 30?

Mr. TELLER. No; I will not make it previous to June 30, because I want it a general provision of law with reference to a volunteer. If the Senator objects to that, I shall take a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to offer his amendment now?

Mr. TELLER. I offer this amendment to the amendment because the amendment is up, and I understand this is the proper time to offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But under the unanimous-consent agreement, after the committee amendments have been acted upon, favorably or unfavorably, everything is to be open to amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will let it go and offer it hereafter, when the bill shall be perfected, and when there will be plenty of time. I wish to say that if the Senator who has this in charge insists upon his objection to it, I am then going to submit a few remarks to show why I think this change ought to be made.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, before the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is agreed to, I should like to inquire of that Senator how many volunteers will be open to the lieutenancy provided for in the last three lines? I understand that it applies only to volunteers now in the service:

Enlisted men of volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants.

Now, we passed a law on the 2d of March, 1899, providing for these volunteers, and I think very few of them were enlisted before the 1st of July of that year. I do not think this holds out a very great opportunity for enlisted men who are now serving in the Philippines or elsewhere to become second lieutenants, because they can not make application unless they have served two years. So I think this is a very small boon to those soldiers of the 35,000 men who enlisted for the term of two years and three months, or whatever the term was.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I had intended to make it clear before that any volunteer now in the service or who has served any time, no matter how long or how short, since the 21st of April, 1898, is eligible for appointment as first or second lieutenant on the designation of the President.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that. That is the first part of the section.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is the first part of it. The second part of it will cover a great many cases, and some have already come in under it, where men served a few months in the volunteers and then enlisted in the regulars. They are being appointed all the time, as I said. Sixty-five officers were appointed this last year to second lieutenancies, and they are eligible to come in at any time when their entire service, volunteer and regular, amounts to two years.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that by law? This seems to provide that if they have served for two years in the volunteer service they shall be entitled to the same privilege as an enlisted man who served in the Regular Army for two years. Now, the Senator I think very well said that they should count the volunteer service. That certainly can not be counted unless it is a part of some statute. I do not know whether it is or not. In the face of this law, that service can not be counted unless it is provided for in the law itself.

Mr. PROCTOR. The law as it stands has been interpreted by the Department to include the volunteer service. They have been acting upon it. There would be no objection to adding to this that their service in the volunteers shall be counted as a part of the required two years; but that interpretation has already been made and acted upon by the Department, and appointments have been made under it.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely call attention to it. Now, there is one other inquiry that I wish to make in respect to the amendment. What is the purpose and effect of the following clauses?

But no officer appointed under the provisions of this section shall be placed above another in the same grade with longer commissioned service.

I understand that to mean a longer commission in the Volunteer Army. It is the last clause I wish to call attention to:

And nothing herein contained shall change the relative rank of officers heretofore commissioned in the Regular Army.

Mr. SPOONER. How?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know how it could do it, except I can see that possibly an officer might be appointed under the first provision to a first lieutenancy and take grade above an officer, for instance, who graduated at Westpoint who is now only a second lieutenant. What is the construction given to that clause? I do not think that would be right.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I do not understand that it has any such effect. It merely preserves those heretofore commissioned; their relative rank between each other shall not be disturbed by this enactment.

Mr. ALLISON. But suppose a graduate at Westpoint was commissioned second lieutenant in 1899 or in 1898 and is still a second lieutenant in the Regular Army. This amendment provides that persons may be appointed either to the grade of first or second lieutenant. Now, suppose one of these persons should be appointed a first lieutenant, would he not take grade above the second lieutenant in the Regular Army, the graduate of Westpoint, say, of the class of 1898? I do not know but that it ought to be so. However, it does not quite seem to me that that ought to be the case.

Mr. PROCTOR. If appointed first lieutenant he would take rank above all the second lieutenants.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. PROCTOR. That, I understand, is what the Senator thinks ought to be the case.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not think it ought to be the case. I think that graduates at Westpoint who were graduated, say, in 1898, and who may have served as second lieutenants and have not been promoted ought to have an opportunity for promotion in the Regular Army, whatever that may be. But if the President of the United States shall fill up all the vacant places or places that may be created by this law by appointing these persons to the rank of first lieutenant it will relegate, of course, a body of young men to a second lieutenancy for a great number of years. It does not seem to me that that is quite right, but if the committee have looked into it and believe it ought to be done, I shall not criticise it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I do not disagree substantially with the views of the Senator from Iowa. The action of the committee when the bill was first brought before the Senate limited these appointments to the second lieutenancies.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. PROCTOR. That was the opinion of the committee; but it seemed, as near as we could judge, that the sentiment of the Senate was to open the grade of first lieutenant, and this proposition does it.

The point the Senator makes is well taken, that the recent graduates would be jumped if the President made appointments to the grade of first lieutenant. The clause in regard to relative rank, I understand, merely preserves the rank now existing to those heretofore commissioned; that is, that nothing shall be done to put an appointee of 1900 over one appointed the yeaf previous who is already on the Register.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the fact stated by the Senator from Vermont is of no consequence whatever if it be the policy of this bill to make provision for first lieutenants. It seems to me, if we open the door at all to first and second lieutenants, we had better leave that matter to the President of the United States to appoint when there is a vacancy. If the President thinks that some volunteer officer or soldier is entitled to rank some West-point officer, he ought to have the power to exercise that judgment. That power will hardly be abused in the United States, for it is certain that the policy of our Government has not been to encourage volunteers so far as giving them commissions. There has been very little encouragement for the promotion of the actual enlisted man under our system. There is probably no government in the world which has been more conservative, notwithstanding all our boasts of equality, than the United States Government in maintaining that the common enlisted man should not be promoted.

Of course, there must be some system of putting proper men into the Army; but I think there is no danger of abuse in this respect, and that we may leave to the Commander in Chief of the Army, the President of the United States, the right to make these appointments. I believe that under certain conditions a man who performs heroic service, and who is a second lieutenant, ought not to be debarred from being made a captain without going through the other grade of first lieutenant. There ought to be the power to make him a major, or a colonel, or anything else which the Commander in Chief of the Army thought him entitled to. It was a source of great strength to old Bonaparte that whenever a meritorious officer, no matter what his rank, displayed great ability he was promoted. He could make a field marshal anywhere, on any day; he could make a field marshal from a private. He did a great many of those things which incited the French army to deeds of heroism which otherwise they would not have performed.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state to the Senator that at the close of the civil war all the grades were thrown open. The present Lieutenant-General Commanding, from a volunteer officer, was appointed a colonel in the Regular Army, as were many others.

This bill was not originally framed on that basis; but at the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and some others, and it seeming to be the sentiment of the Senate that the committee ought to liberalize the provision more than we had done, we put in first lieutenants. My own opinion is that a great many of the second lieutenants will go up to first lieutenants. There will not be many vacancies, but there will be some. I think it is fair to leave it to the President, who will not do any injustice in the matter.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite willing to leave it to the President. As was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, at the close of the civil war appointments were made from the volunteer forces to the regular force of a large number of people, some of whom had served and some of whom had held very high rank in the volunteer forces, and had rendered very distinguished service. We took those gentlemen and put them into the Regular Army at a very much lower grade. We had to do that, because the higher-grade officers of the Regular Army had been doing their duty and we could not very well jump them. I believe—I do not know certainly as to that—that the General Commanding the Army was made a lieutenant-colonel, and possibly a colonel, in the Regular Army.

Mr. SEWELL. A colonel.

Mr. TELLER. A colonel; and from that he has come up to his present position. I know a great many very good officers, who had held high rank in the volunteers, who were made captains in the Regular Army, because, I suppose, there was no higher place in which to put them, and some of them have since become colonels and some have become generals. What I want is elasticity—an opportunity for the soldier.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] thinks that we are never going to have any more volunteer soldiers. Why, Mr. President, if we should have a war with a foreign power—which I pray we may not have—we would have a volunteer service at once. We could not do otherwise.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not intend to say, and I think I did not say, that we should never want any more volunteers if we should have a great war. I said there was no provision for any more volunteers after June 30 of this year, when the present law expires. If we should become involved in a great war, it would be proper to put a volunteer force in the field. In such a case we might need volunteers but for a very short time.

Mr. TELLER. If the volunteers were needed for but a short time and did not render service of the proper character, they would not get any positions in the Regular Army at all. If they did render meritorious service, no matter whether their service was long or short, they ought to have that reward which is the great incentive to military men.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this matter opens a very important question and, to some of us, an entirely new question. I should like the opportunity to examine the amendment, so as to find what its effect will be, how far it will reach, and whether graduates of the Military Academy may be overslaughed by it. Therefore I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that, as it is late, we let the matter go over to-night, and that we take it up in the morning. If this is agreeable, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me a moment in which to pass a pension bill for a soldier who is very near death.

Mr. HALE. I will withhold my motion for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. With the permission of the Senator who has the floor, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be received and ordered to be printed.

HIRAM I. HOYT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5360) granting an increase of pension to Hiram I. Hoyt.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Hiram I. Hoyt, late of Company H, Tenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID M'MURTRIE GREGG.

Mr. HALE and Mr. PENROSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HALE. I yield for routine business.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to call up a bill.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3210) authorizing the appointment and retirement of David McMurtrie Gregg as a captain in the United States Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of David McMurtrie Gregg, brevet major-general of United States Volunteers, before and during the late war of the rebellion, especially for gallant conduct at the battle of Gettysburg, and his participation and gallant conduct in forty or more battles and engagements, as shown by the records of the War Department, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the consent of the Senate, to appoint the said David McMurtrie Gregg, late a captain in the United States Army and a brevet major-general of volunteers, to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list as of that grade, the retired list being hereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said David McMurtrie Gregg, nor shall any compensation be paid him for any period prior to his appointment under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have that bill explained a little. Is it simply to retire a captain of the civil war or a captain in the late war with Spain?

Mr. PENROSE. This bill relates to General Gregg, one of the most distinguished cavalry officers during the civil war. The bill is to permit the President to appoint him and retire him.

Mr. HOAR. Has he any rank in the service now as a volunteer?

Mr. PENROSE. No.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with what is the proper policy in such a matter, especially where it is intended to pay an honor to a gallant soldier, but if the policy is to be adopted that a famous and gallant soldier who served in the civil war is now to be taken from civil life as a mode for providing for his old age, or doing him honor, if he is to be singled out and appointed to a place on the retired list—which, of course, is substantially a pension, with a certain special honor—I know of some soldiers in my own region who were as gallant officers as ever tied a sash about their belts, who are living lives of great frugality, not to say of hardship, whose names I want to present to the Committee on Military Affairs for a like distinction. If the committee have some policy or principle on which they are going to act on this case, which will govern and control all like cases, I should like to have that policy or purpose stated.

Mr. PENROSE. This bill has already twice passed the Senate. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can explain better than I whether it is in strict accord with the policy of the committee.

There was no more distinguished soldier of the late war than General Gregg. I understand he was a major-general of volunteers. He resigned for sundry reasons from the position of captain in the Regular Army; and this, in the few remaining years that are left to him, is simply an act of justice on the part of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If there is a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, I think it ought to be read for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. HALE. Does this bill retire General Gregg only with the actual rank he held?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Not the volunteer rank?

Mr. PENROSE. No; his regular rank.

Mr. HALE. His regular rank as captain, without pension or back pay?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator did not state that in the answer he before made to me. He stated simply that this was a gallant volunteer soldier who has been in civil life for many years, and that it was proposed now to give him a place on the retired list of the Regular Army. Now, I understand that he has been an officer of the Regular Army, that for some reason he was retired, and he is to be restored to the rank in the Regular Army he had previously held. That is altogether a different case from the one before stated by the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I did not make myself clear enough.

Mr. HOAR. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to discuss that matter, and I am willing to follow the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas demand the reading of the report?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the report read.

Mr. HAWLEY. This bill gives General Gregg the rank he had in the Regular Army before the war. It is rather a delicate matter to speak of, but I understand he is very poor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. It is too late an hour to begin the reading of that report.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not very long.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the bill go over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let this poor old soldier have a chance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I asked to have the bill go over. It will take some time to have the report read and to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report has been demanded, and it is the right of a Senator to have it read.

Mr. ALLISON. If that report is to be read, I hope, pending the consideration of this matter, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will renew his motion.

Mr. HOAR. I did not ask for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was the Senator from Arkansas who asked for the reading.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has his bill up, but, of course, if the reading of the report is insisted upon it will take a half hour's time. I should hope the Senator from Arkansas would be content with a statement of the case and of exactly what is proposed. I at first thought that it was a proposition to retire General Gregg upon the rank which he held in the volunteer force as major-general.

Mr. HAWLEY. We never do that.

Mr. HALE. There is no precedent for that, but this is really a different case, where it is only proposed to retire this man upon the rank he held in the Regular Army after the civil war was over, and not the volunteer rank. That we have done in several cases. We have done it in the Navy and we have done it in the Army.

Mr. HAWLEY. I may mention an instance—that of General Pleasonton.

Mr. HALE. I do not see any objection to the bill. Undoubtedly General Gregg was a very great soldier. During the civil war we heard from him almost every morning.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that General Gregg was one of the best soldiers we ever had in the service. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HALE. He was, undoubtedly.

Mr. SEWELL. But I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I will not press the bill further now, Mr. President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 10, 1901, at 12 o'clock m.

LEASE OF PREMISES FOR POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LOUD. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (H. R. 13274) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease suitable premises for use of the Post-Office Department was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be empowered to lease suitable premises in the city of Washington for the purposes of the rural free-delivery system, at a cost not to exceed $4,000 per annum, payable out of the appropriation for that service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about this matter, but I presume the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has unanimously recommended the bill. Is that true?

Mr. LOUD. It has been reported unanimously by that committee and is recommended by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it a fact that the new Post-Office building is not of sufficient capacity to accommodate the business of the Department?

Mr. LOUD. That seems, unfortunately, to be the condition which confronts us. This matter was presented to the Appropriations Committee and to our committee some time ago; and it occurred to us—when I say "us" I mean the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and myself—it occurred to us that there ought to be room enough in that building for all these various purposes of the Department. But I have been to the building and made examinations, and I find the space to be all occupied. While it is true there are some rooms in which it might be possible to put one or two more clerks, yet the Postmaster-General says that in view of the character of this work and the necessity that the clerks should have within reach the files with which they have to deal, it would be impracticab'e to meet the wants of this rural free delivery by putting one or two clerks here and there in various rooms. This service, as the gentleman knows, is growing; I might say, perhaps, abnormally.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it true that the Department is also occupying the old departmental building?

Mr. LOUD. It is not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They have given up all that?

Mr. LOUD. The Interior Department has been in there for some time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then all of the old building is now used by the Interior Department?

Mr. LOUD. The Interior Department is occupying all of the old Post-Office Department building; and also the leased quarters formerly used by that Department have been surrendered by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, it seems to me unfortunate that this new building is not large enough to accommodate the business of the Government.

Mr. LOUD. It is unfortunate, but the Auditor's department is in the Post-Office Department building, I believe very improperly. I believe that the Post-Office Department and the Auditor's department should be as far apart as possible. But the Auditor's department has been put in there, and has absorbed all the space that was not required by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As this matter is now before the House, I would like to ask one other question—whether this rural free-delivery service is growing and whether it requires more room now than heretofore?

Mr. LOUD. I will say that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, the appropriation for this service was some $300,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, the appropriation was $1,750,000. There is estimated for the next fiscal year an appropriation of $3,500,000; and a great many of the "brethren" around here are insisting on having $5,000,000, and I have no doubt they will secure it before we get through.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have been unable to get this rural free-delivery service extended to my district, although I have made frequent requests and submitted frequent recommendations to that effect. But I am not complaining of that.

Mr. LOUD. The more you get of this service the worse off you will be.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much space is contemplated as necessary for occupation by the rural free-delivery service?

Mr. LOUD. This bill proposes to lease one floor of the Star Building, which is opposite the Post-Office Department. I called in the aid of the Assistant Architect of the Capitol, who is regarded as an expert in these matters, and he considered the limit of amount provided in this bill as a very reasonable rental for one floor of that building. There are a little over 2,700 square feet, exclusive of corridors.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How many rooms do you get?

Mr. LOUD. Twelve, I believe. I counted them yesterday, but I can not state the number with certainty.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then 12 rooms are required now to accommodate this rural free delivery?

Mr. LOUD. There are about 75 clerks or employees now engaged in this service, and probably there will be 150 before the end of the year.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I have been a great deal interested in the allotment of space for the Post-Office Department, and when the matter was under consideration we supposed that for many years to come there would be sufficient room in that building for all postal purposes. I understand the gentleman from California now to say that he has consulted with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOUD. We consulted several times. I will not say that the gentleman from Illinois advocated this proposition; but he said he would give it up, and would like to have the Post-Office Committee take charge of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Massachusetts would indulge me, I would like to put one further inquiry to the gentleman from California, and then I shall be through. Did I understand that gentleman to say that if the force of the auditing department was removed from the Post-Office building there would be room enough for the rural free-delivery service?

Mr. LOUD. There is no doubt of that. There are about 1,500 clerks of the Auditor's department in the Post-Office Department building.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire how necessary it is to pass this bill this morning?

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, the rooms are now overcrowded. Let me say that in rooms now devoted to the rural free-delivery service—or rooms which are now used jointly—there are, in a room the size of one of our committee rooms, 15 to 20 clerks; and the demands of the service require additional force, which can not be put on unless we provide this additional space. They are now more crowded than they should be.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I add to what the gentleman has said, that the superintendent of the free delivery, who has charge of this branch of the service, tells me that there are two or three clerks now on leave, sick or otherwise, and when they return it will be absolutely impossible to find seating room in the space now occupied by their force.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution 144, and for its immediate consideration. I would state for the information of the House that this is perfectly agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution 144 and that the same be now taken up for consideration. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 144.

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than members of Congress, caused by the death of William Lyne Wilson, of Virginia, shall be filled by the appointment of George Gray, a resident of Delaware.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

HOUSE BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following House bills passed by the Senate with amendments. The amendments were severally read and concurred in:

A bill (H. R. 1734) granting a pension to Mary A. Whitmore;

A bill (H. R. 9108) granting a pension to Maria H. Hixon;

A bill (H. R. 5117) granting a pension to Roland Burnett;

A bill (H. R. 2752) granting an increase of pension to Edmund P. Tierney;

A bill (H. R. 10032) granting an increase of pension to Harriet Crotsenburg; and

A bill (H. R. 5555) granting a pension to Lurinda Laughlin.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina for ten days, on account of important business.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 13189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. Before the motion is presented to the House to go into the Committee of the Whole, I would like to ascertain whether we can agree as to the amount of time for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the motion. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13189, being the river and harbor appropriation bill, and pending that seeks to make an arrangement to limit general debate.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, from the few requests that have been made for time, that three hours would be required for general debate. Three gentlemen who desire to propose amendments looking toward a rather different policy in the appropriations to be made by the bill have each requested twenty minutes, and that would consume one hour.

Mr. McRAE. I have not indicated to the gentleman that I desire time, but I do desire to discuss the bill; and twenty minutes will be enough for me; and if any arrangement is made, I hope it will include my having twenty minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman inform us whether there are any members of the committee who oppose this measure?

Mr. BURTON. There are not.

Mr. CORLISS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask the right of being recognized in opposition to this bill.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we first agree on the time to be consumed in general debate, and then that can be arranged.

Mr. CORLISS. If it can be equitably divided I have no objection.

Mr. BURTON. After it is determined what length of time shall be consumed in general debate, then it can be arranged as to how the time shall be controlled.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I think that three hours is hardly enough for this important measure. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it not the right of a member——

Mr. BURTON. We are trying to reach an equitable agreement for time for general debate.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of members on this floor who desire to oppose the bill, and it seems to me that three hours' debate is not enough for a bill that carries $60,000,000. That leaves about three minutes to a million dollars. Now, there are several of us on the floor who do not agree with the provisions of the bill, and who desire to be heard, and when the gentleman said that three gentlemen had asked him for time, and they have agreed to take twenty minutes each, I desire to say I was not included in that category. I was told by the gentleman that I could, perhaps, have twenty minutes. Twenty minutes was not what I indicated. That is not all that I expected to obtain. I do not think three hours' debate is sufficient for any of the members who rise in opposition to this bill to make the remarks they desire to make on the bill. I know that twenty minutes will not cover the time I desire in addressing myself to the bill.

Mr. BOREING. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, and I would like to be heard at least twenty minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to ask my friend from Washington if he voted to increase the membership of the House so as to have more time for debate?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir; I did.

The SPEAKER. As there is evidently no agreement in sight, the Chair will put the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CORLISS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURTON. I do not give up the hope that we can agree upon a time. I want to suggest that general debate be limited to three hours.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Michigan has a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, if the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, will he not have absolute control of the time upon the floor in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Not at all; only an hour. He controls an hour, and will have general control of the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. Will a member opposing the measure have control of the time in opposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking a parliamentary inquiry that pertains to the Committee of the Whole. Nobody can control all the time. These are matters which will be controlled in the committee, and the Speaker has no power to say what shall be done there. We are now in the House, and that is a matter for the action of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is now in session pursuance to the direction of the House for the purpose of considering House bill 13189, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ascertain if gentlemen opposed to the bill can agree upon some one who will control the time of those in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. I did not hear what the gentleman from Ohio said.

Mr. BURTON. I asked if gentlemen opposed to the bill could agree upon some one who would control the time of those in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. I being the member of the House who asked recognition for that purpose, and assuring those who desire to oppose the bill all the time they want, if I can obtain it, I ask that I be recognized in opposition to it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Michigan be recognized as controlling the time of those in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Washington that that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] be permitted to control the time in opposition to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. McRAE. I object to that, Mr. Chairman; the gentleman from Michigan can be recognized for an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors present this bill with the confidence that no measure before Congress confers greater benefit upon the country. Nothing has contributed more to make the nineteenth century the greatest of all the centuries than improvements in transportation. These improvements have not only brought nations and States nearer together, but they have made possible the enjoyment of a far greater share of the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life. Increased facilities for transportation have greatly increased production and consumption, because, except for these improvements, a large share of that which is now annually consumed could not be brought within the reach of the consumer. Thus, increase of production and transportation must go hand in hand.

But for the improvements in distributive energy, a very large share of that which is now produced and consumed could not reach the consumer.

The late Mr. Mulhall, in 1896, made the estimate that in the preceding fifty years distributive energy had increased three times faster than production proper. The same statistician used the illustration that it now costs less to carry a bushel of wheat from St. Paul to Liverpool, a distance of 4,831 statute miles, than it cost in the days of Miltiades and Themistocles to carry the same bushel of wheat from Athens to Marathon, a distance of 20 miles by wagon road.

No country has gained greater benefits from these improvements in transportation than our own. They have afforded a stimulus to our industry; they have made possible the development of our mines, our forests, and our farms, and made available the enormous supplies which can be used for consumption all over the globe. We must, in order to continue this progress, improve our facilities for transportation by land and water as well. Not to continue these improvements is to fall backward. The distinctive feature of this bill is the provision made for deeper waterways and larger harbors, where already large traffic exists, and increased facilities are made necessary by the deeper draft and larger size of boats and the large number of boats frequenting them. This was also the distinctive feature of the bill of 1899.

Next to appropriations made for the Mississippi River, which we regard as in accordance with the settled policy of the Government, the largest project to which this bill commits us is that for Boston Harbor. An appropriation is made of $600,000 and authority is given for the additional expenditure of $3,000,000 to secure a channel 35 feet deep and respectively 1,200 and 1,500 feet wide from the wharves in the inner harbor to the sea. The total cost of these improvements when completed will be nearly $8,000,000. In the bill of 1899 we made provision, by the appropriation or authorization of $4,000,000, for a channel 40 feet deep and 2,000 feet wide from New York to the sea.

In this bill by the appropriation or authorization of eighteen hundred thousand dollars we have provided for the deepening of Buttermilk Channel, a subsidiary channel in New York, enabling vessels to reach that portion of Brooklyn where exist the largest and greatest number of warehouses. This channel also facilitates the movement of boats from New York Bay to the East River.

We have also made provision by an appropriation of $100,000 and an authorization of $596,000 additional for deepening and improving the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey.

This channel has an enormous traffic and is subsidiary to the commerce centering at New York City.

We have also made provision for the improvement of the Passaic River, so as to give the city of Newark, which already has a very large traffic, increased facilities.

We have made appropriations and authorizations with a view to deepening the Delaware River to a depth of 30 feet from Philadelphia to the sea.

In prior bills provision has been made for deepening the Patapsco River to a depth of 30 feet and a suitable width from the city of Baltimore to deep water in Chesapeake Bay.

We have provided in this bill for additional harbor room at Baltimore by improving Spring Garden Harbor, as it is called, at an expense of a little over $300,000.

At an expense of $225,000 we have provided for a channel 30 feet in depth from the open sea to Newport News, the most rapidly growing port on the Atlantic coast.

Together with sums already on hand, we have authorized the expenditure of a million of dollars for the improvement of the channel from Savannah to the sea. This port is the most important in its tonnage of all the ports on the Atlantic and Gulf coast between the mouth of the James River and the mouth of the Mississippi.

We have provided for the improvement of the St. Johns River from Jacksonville to the ocean.

We have provided amply for prosecuting the improvement of the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi, with a view to a navigable depth of 35 feet, in order to afford an outlet for the various products of the Mississippi Valley.

We have provided for increased harbor facilities for the city of Buffalo.

We have provided at the city of Cleveland for the improvement of the entrance to the breakwater already existing, and the extension of the breakwater eastward so as to afford a better harbor of refuge and give additional and needed harbor room.

We have provided for the improvement of the Detroit River, appropriating or authorizing the expenditure of $1,750,000 with a view to providing a channel 600 feet in width sufficient for the great traffic along that waterway.

We have appropriated $330,000 for the improvement, by doubling the channel, of the St. Clair Flats Canal. This canal was opened to traffic in 1870, or perhaps a year or two earlier, and the traffic there has outgrown the facilities afforded. The grounding of a single boat would stop the traffic of the Lakes, and there is urgent call for immediate improvement.

By an appropriation or authorization of four and a half millions we have provided for the improvement of the connecting waters between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, giving an alternative channel, so as to afford an up and a down route. The total estimate for this improvement is $5,750,000. We have limited the appropriation or authorization to four and a half millions in the hope that possibly this may finish the project, but with the view, at any rate, to providing ample funds for the rapid prosecution of this very important work.

In the bill of 1899 we authorized the expenditure of a million and a half for the improvement of the mouth of the Calumet River, at South Chicago, a portion of the harbor of Chicago in which more and more the heavy freights are handled, and where there exist very extensive furnaces and manufactories of iron and steel.

We have authorized or appropriated a million and a half dollars to repair damage caused to the jetties at Galveston by the great storm of last autumn. It seemed absolutely necessary to provide for the reparation of these jetties in order to preserve the port. It is probable that this expense will make the jetties somewhat more complete than they were before the storm; but if an additional amount is required it is an economical expenditure of money.

We have provided for the improvement of San Diego Harbor, in the southerly part of California. A small authorization is made for the harbor of San Francisco. This great harbor probably needs less artificial aid than any harbor in the country. It seemed but due to provide a small amount for the blowing out of a rock which, while it merely impedes local traffic across the bay, is a menace to safe navigation.

We have provided for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River. The improvement in this locality has been quite unsatisfactory. It has been found necessary to extend the jetties into the sea to a depth of 40 feet—a depth made necessary by the fact that the heavy waves make it difficult for large ocean ships to enter at a less depth of water.

The minor harbors of the country and the rivers and the creeks which afford facilities for inland navigation have not been neglected.

This bill carries approximately in appropriation for the next fiscal year $22,800,000. It authorizes contracts to be made in the future, for which appropriations are to be carried on future sundry civil bills, approximating $37,150,000—in all, nearly $60,000,000.

The amount authorized or appropriated for the ensuing fiscal year is larger, with one exception, than that in any prior bill. The amount carried in the bill of 1890 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, was larger by $2,300,000. The bill for 1888 was only less by about $400,000. The total of appropriations and authorizations, however, is less by $12,000,000 than those carried in the bill of June, 1896.

A comparison of the appropriations for the last twenty years shows that the river and harbor appropriations have not increased as rapidly as those for fortifications, for pensions, for the Army, or for the Navy. The committee feels justified in bringing in a bill for this amount. This bill looks toward peace and the commercial development of the country's commerce. The task has been one of great difficulty, because we have had before us estimates officially made the total amount of which is more than $300,000,000, and it has been found necessary to eliminate, at least for the present, as much as four-fifths of the amount required for the completion of improvements for which there are estimates.

This bill, I will further say, has not increased in its appropriations for the last twenty years more rapidly than the expenses of conducting the Post-Office Department, that Department of the country which is most in touch with the commercial growth of the country, and which most reflects the demand for increased facilities. It seems not unreasonable to ask that each year twenty-five to thirty million dollars shall be expended for river and harbor improvements; and whether this amount shall continue, whether it shall increase or decrease, will depend upon certain general consideration as to policy.

There are four questions which will arise which I wish to take up in their order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if he can state to the committee the probable amount of river and harbor appropriations that will be carried in the sundry civil bill for the next fiscal year?

Mr. BURTON. A little over $8,000,000 for the next fiscal year, making in all, this year, $31,000,000.

The first question will be whether the improvements on the Mississippi River must be continued at the present rate of expense or whether completed results will be attained at an early day. The appropriations for that portion below Cairo have averaged for a number of years between two million and two million five hundred thousand dollars per annum; those for the upper portion above Cairo over half this amount.

The second question—and it is one to which I ask the attention of the House—is the policy that shall be pursued in regard to the construction of locks and dams in navigable streams. We have a great many of those projects before us. While not wishing to criticise previous river and harbor bills, it is evident a policy has been pursued which looks only to very remote results. Rivers like the Tennessee, the Coosa, the Cumberland, and others have been improved by locks and dams in detached portions of those respective rivers without any connection between them. The committee have thought it best to adopt a policy under which each river shall be improved from its mouth toward its source, save under exceptional conditions.

Unless a depth of 6 feet can be obtained in thickly settled portions of the country it is doubtful whether this class of improvements can profitably be pursued. When you fall below that depth, unless it be in a sparsely settled country, railroad transportation can be made available at cheaper rates.

We have not included in this bill any new projects for locks and dams, except in Trinity River, in the State of Texas, where we have appropriated or authorized $750,000, part for general improvements and part for the construction of locks and dams.
